New Editions of standard Political Science texts

Gettell's HISTORY OF POLITICAL THOUGHT

2nd EDITION

By LAWRENCE C. WANLASS

This revision of a standard text in its field traces the development of political thought from its earliest beginnings to the present. Five chapters have been completely rewritten, five partially rewritten, and five substantially revised. The scope of the book covers the nature of political thought, ancient political thought, medieval political thought, the beginnings of modern political thought, modern liberal theory, the growth of fascism, and the development of communism. Most sections dealing with principal figures in political philosophy have been enlarged. Less attention is paid to 19th century thought, making room for a full consideration of democratic socialism, fascism, and communism. Up-to-date bibliographies appear at the ends of the chapters.

Large Royal 8vo—About 416 pp.—To be published in January

Sait's AMERICAN PARTIES and ELECTIONS

5th EDITION

By HOWARD R. PENNIMAN

This standard text for college courses in American political parties has been revised and brought up to date to include recent data and present-day methods. Notable among the features of the Fifth Edition are a timely and important new chapter on the nature, history, and organization of the Communist party in the United States, and a new chapter on the influence of pressure groups on our legislative processes. The chapter on Negro suffrage has been brought in line with recent developments, and the discussions of the boss, the political machine, and the use of radio and television in politics contribute important new material to the literature of political science.

As before, this text offers an unusually detailed, complete, and up-to-date coverage of the American party system. Its presentation is interesting, realistic, and scholarly.

Review and Reflection

A HALF-CENTURY OF LABOR RELATIONS

BY CY CHING

The highlights of developments in the most dynamic era of industrial relations are portrayed by an active participant in this entire half century of evolution.

This is a book which can be of unique usefulness as a supplementary text for students of industrial relations and labor legislation.

Cy Ching, worker, industrial relations director, Director of Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, presents an interesting and informative account of progress in labor-management affairs during the past fifty years. His book is an intimate, impartial story of growth from unmitigated antagonism to today's enlightened attitudes toward labor-management problems. It is rich in concrete illustrations of prejudices and adjustments in striving for accord.

From a wisdom born of a lifetime of effort in molding sensible attitudes toward common purposes, and in reviewing the stresses and strains of eventful impacts and solutions, Cy Ching has developed a volume of important value to any student of labor relations.

THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT— DEMOCRACY IN ACTION

By Charles E. Merriam and Robert E. Merriam

In a democracy government is everybody's business and here is the book that makes this clear. THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT presents the problems of government in such a way that the student realizes the importance of government and sees how he is a participant.

This new and teachable text is designed as an introductory course. Its content is selective, rather than encyclopedic. Its style is informal and inspiring.

Using a practical approach, this book proceeds from the dynamics of politics in action to the nature of constitutionalism. The authors give the student the benefit of their personal political experience in units on state and local government. A thorough discussion of our national government, the U.S. in world affairs, and various aspects of democracy make up the concluding units.

PUBLIC OPINION and PROPAGANDA

by FREDERICK C. IRION, University of New Mexico

Sound workmanship

"In over-all view, Irion's Public Opinion and Propaganda is a major contribution to the literature in this field."—International Journal of Opinion and Attitude Research (Summer, 1951).

"In the words of the author, the purpose of this book is to present 'a comprehensive statement of what is known about public opinion and to discuss the possibilities for increased knowledge concerning it.' It is the over-all judgment of this reviewer that Irion succeeds in both these objectives. . . ."—Public Opinion Quarterly (Fall, 1950).

and creative approach

"For some reason the use of culture as a frame of reference, an approach first developed by anthropologists and then widely adopted by sociologists and psychologists, has never been generally utilized by political scientists despite their long familiarity with that procedure. I hope that the cultural approach to the subject, as used here, will provide a broader and more satisfying understanding of public opinion and propaganda than has been available heretofore."—From the Preface of Public Opinion and Propaganda.

International Relations

NORMAN D. PALMER

HOWARD C. PERKINS

University of Pennsylvania

... Here is an admirable volume which explains clearly, fully and objectively this "world community in transition." It should enable the reader to grasp intelligently the multifold problems that face him as he opens his morning newspaper.

As the authors say in their preface, they aimed at a book "with balance," i.e., with "a proper attention to principles, to historical background, to international organization and to recent developments;" a book that "would have simplicity of organization and clarity of presentation." They have achieved their aim with signal success. One might almost say that they have rolled half a dozen short books into one well ordered, large volume.

The first 400 pages, by way of background for readers without much formal training in history and international politics, analyze effectively, with plenty of definitions, the nature of the state, nationalism and sovereignty, the bases of national power, and such instruments of policy as diplomacy, war, propaganda and collective security.

The next 200 pages give a remarkably precise and fairminded condensation of the causes of World War I, the treaties of 1919, and the deteriorating international relations which culminated in the Second World War. Next comes a consideration of "Conflict and Change" since 1945—in Europe, Asia, and in global economic problems.

This is then spelt out in greater detail in excellent chapters on the foreign policy and national interest of Russia, Britain, the United States, France and some other countries. Finally three chapters on "The Resumption of the Great Experiment"—perhaps the best in the book—give a very clear and impressive picture of the organization and manifold activities of the United Nations.

The authors have quoted freely from the writings of others so that the reader becomes familiar with many of the best authorities and the titles of their works which are wisely woven into the text instead of being relegated to footnotes. These quotations often represent opposing views. . . .

In general as hard-headed realists, they caution against relying too much on any one solution or panacea. They are not unduly pessimistic or optimistic. They do not foresee dire catastrophe or speedy improvement and progress, but observe: "He who has read history cannot avoid the conclusion that the rule of slow but uneven change will prevail in international relations." The many diagrammatic charts, maps and suggestive cartoons add greatly to the easy understanding of the subject. . . .

MODERN FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS

Revised Edition

The political backgrounds and basic problems of Britain, the USSR, France, Germany, Canada, Norway, Sweden, Argentina, and Japan form the basis of this study. The book compares the elements of the various governments with one another and especially with corresponding elements in the government of the United States.

In revising the original edition, Professor Zink has included the latest developments in present-day political organization and operation.

Important McGraw-Hill Books

ELEMENTS OF AMERICAN GOVERNMENT. New second edition

By JOHN H. FERGUSON, Pennsylvania State College and DEAN E. McHENRY, University of California at Los Angeles. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. Ready in March.

Here is a brief text for the general course on American Government treating federal, state and local government. The new edition—largely rewritten—is up to date, easy to read, and more extensively and effectively illustrated than previously.

THE AMERICAN SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT THE AMERICAN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

By JOHN H. FERGUSON and DEAN E. McHENRY. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. Third editions.

The American System of Government, 1056 pages, $6.00, is an exceptional text for political science courses covering national, state, and local government. In this edition organization remains the same while style is more vivid and stimulating. Beginning with a general discussion of political ideas and institutions from colonial, revolutionary, and confederate periods, the text goes on to a discussion of Constitution, essentials of national government and national powers and functions. The chapters on local and state governments embrace constitutions and charters, legislative bodies, executives, and selected functions.

The American Federal Government, 902 pages, $5.50, is an abridgment of The American System of Government including only sections and chapters covering the national scene.

STURGIS STANDARD CODE OF PARLIAMENTARY PROCEDURE

By ALICE F. STURGIS. 280 pages, $3.00.

In this thoroughly modern handbook of parliamentary procedure, the author has produced a handbook that is unquestionably the best of its kind today. It is excellently organized, simply written, best arranged for easy reference, and up to date. Applicable to any meeting, large or small, formal or informal, it emphasizes simple, courteous, and democratic methods of running meetings.

LEARNING PARLIAMENTARY PROCEDURE

By ALICE F. STURGIS. 358 pages, $4.00 (text edition available)

Of interest to political scientists and sociologists, as well as those in the speech field, this new volume provides an excellent instrument for teaching procedure. The methods presented are based, naturally, on the system presented in the author's successful work, Sturgis Standard Code of Parliamentary Procedure. Here is a fine text in the subject, well presented, readable, and stimulating throughout.

Bolshevism: An Introduction to Soviet Communism, by Waldemar Gurian, $3.25.

Professor Gurian gives a clear and cogent treatment of Bolshevism, revealing its basic features as a social and political religion. The essence of modern Communism is seen as an historical-social force that influences, and is influenced by, historical-social developments.

"... It is especially valuable because it illuminates so fully the basic factors which drive the Soviet regime to control and direct all aspects of life, and it traces the origins of the messianic mission self-imposed on Soviet leaders. It is an essential study for understanding the strengths and weaknesses of the Soviet Ideology."—Philip E. Mosely, Professor of International Relations, Russian Institute, Columbia University.

Pan-Slavism: Its History and Ideology, by Hans Kohn, $6.25.

This is the first book in English to present a comprehensive survey and analysis of Slav nationalism, from its beginning after the Napoleonic Wars to its climax in and after World War II. The generally overlooked sources into which the book delves will help the English-reading public gain a better understanding of the complex relationship between Russia and Europe and among the Slav nations themselves.

Diplomacy in a Whirlpool: Hungary Between Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia, by Stephen D. Kertesz, $4.75.

The story of the totalitarian conquest of Hungary by the Nazi and Red regimes is graphically told by a man who served in the Hungarian Foreign Ministry during the war and post-war years. Because Dr. Kertesz is both an actor in what he relates and a political scientist capable of analyzing the situation, this book makes an important contribution to contemporary history.

Soviet Imperialism: Its Origins and Tactics, edited by Waldemar Gurian, $3.75.

Into this book has been gathered the fruits of a symposium on Soviet Imperialism; included are outstanding figures in the field of political science in this country. N. Timasheff of Fordham, Michael Pap of Notre Dame, W. Weintraub of Harvard, R. Pipes of Harvard, F. Barghoorn of Yale, and Ling Nai-jui discuss from various points of view, the questions: Who is the Enemy—Russian Imperialism or Soviet Communism? What are the relations between the aggressive tactics of the U.S.S.R. and traditional Russian policy? Should the United States encourage national liberation movements among non-Russian groups in the Soviet Union or should it limit itself to the fight against Soviet Communism?

The Origins of Soviet-American Diplomacy

By ROBERT PAUL BROWDER. When Litvinov arrived in Washington in 1933 after the sixteen years of diplomatic silence between his country and the U.S., he carried with him his commission as official representative to the U.S., dated 1918 and signed by Lenin and Chicherin, as evidence of the long-standing desire of the Soviet Union for recognition. This is an absorbing narrative of the events which led up to this dramatic arrival, heralded with such high hopes and good will, and of the collapse into discord and disillusionment which followed.

The Dynamics of Soviet Society

*By W. W. ROSTOW, in collaboration with Alfred Levin, and with the assistance of others at the Center for International Studies, Massachusetts Institute of Technology. In an effort to contribute a firmer basis to the making of American foreign policy, and as a social science venture, the Center has produced this analytic synthesis of modern Russian studies. The book reviews the pattern of change in the Soviet past: its higher politics, foreign policy, ideology, economic life, social structure, and culture. It assesses the attitudes towards the regime of all the major groupings in Soviet society, and indicates the meaning of these attitudes for the future. The Dynamics of Soviet Society provides the closest possible scrutiny of Soviet life today. WILLIAM L. LANGER, Harvard University, calls it "one of the few books on Soviet Russia that really explains what has been happening there."*

SOME PRESENT-DAY CRITICS OF LIBERALISM

FRANCIS W. COKER

Yale University

I. INTRODUCTION

"Liberalism" is a late modern word, appearing first (along with "conservatism," "socialism," and "communism") in the early nineteenth century. Its basic ideas are old. The particular freedoms called for have changed as the denials of freedom have changed. The demands have been for liberation from oppressive political rule or intolerant ecclesiastical authority; or from a status of slavery or serfdom; from restraints embodied in laws and customs that hamper the rise of new productive forces, or from limitations on equal opportunity resulting from narrow concentrations of private economic power; from limitations on voting rights and from interferences with freedom of religion, speech, and association. The constant concern has been with pleas for deliverance from restraints which, although perhaps widely regarded at a given time as a normal part of life, have come to be regarded, by some in the community, as unnatural and intolerable.

The founding of such pleas on ideas about man's natural traits also follows a long tradition. It is "the rational principle within us," said Aristotle, that distinguishes man from "the animals," who "do not apprehend reason, but simply obey their instincts." "Language," Aristotle continued, is the sign of this special human faculty; for the distinctive function of language is to express, not "feelings of pain and pleasure"—animals have that faculty—but "perceptions of good and evil, the just and the unjust, and other similar qualities." Again (according to Aristotle): although man is the least self-sufficient being—meant by his nature to live in close association with other men in an organized political community—he is, in the rightly organized community, subject only to the commands of persons who rule under "the laws," which are "sovereign over personal rule, whether it be exercised by a single person or a body of persons."¹ It is in this ancient Greek idea of "freedom under the law" that some historians of ideas have located the origin of "western liberalism," and it is chiefly in this sense that liberalism has been called "the tradition of the West."²

Later examples of such ideas about freedom and reason are familiar, in both religious and secular literature: St. Paul exhorting his readers to heed "the inner law," in man's "mind," "written in the hearts of men"; early Christian jurists maintaining that it is man's nature to be free, so that restraints should be regarded as temporary expedients to correct deviations from normal human behavior; officials of a powerful medieval church intervening to protect citizens from arbitrary political rulers; various secular and ecclesiastical writers, from Cicero on, holding that rulers and people are equally bound by the dictates of right reason; writers of the Renaissance (a rebirth of early Christian as well as of ancient pagan ideas) and the Enlightenment, holding that men can achieve significant values on earth if they set their minds and hearts on releasing themselves from the handicaps of outmoded institutions and an adverse environment; and the later modern phrasing of these beliefs—holding that man, by virtue of his nature, has inalienable rights and that we can best discover truth about man and society through free inquiry and the dialectic of free discussion, or (more concretely) that the "civil liberties" (such as are set forth in modern "bills of rights") must be maintained as essential means for realizing man's highest intellectual, moral, and spiritual values and for reaching viable decisions in a democracy. Such ideas, it has been widely held, have provided approaches towards solving the never fully solvable problem considered in ancient, medieval, and modern political discussions: how to maintain a united community directed by strong and efficient government, without producing incompetent, incomplete citizens. or personalities?

Such ideas do not, of course, make up the whole of the tradition of the West. There have always been advocates of the opposite, or complementary, values of order, stability, and consensus. These values also have been associated with ideas about the nature and destiny of man: with conceptions, that is, of man as a being who attains fulfillment of his nature chiefly by playing his assigned, directed, part in maintaining the existence and well-being of some group (e.g., a nation, class, or "community") in which alone he can find his own existence maintained and explained. Man's chief right or duty, in the extremer forms of such a doctrine, is to "conform," accepting as his own the common or general opinion or will of his group.

When the modern liberal has challenged the reasonableness or justice of particular orders made by official spokesmen for a ruling group, he has sometimes been rebuked as an advocate of disorder or disunity; or if he has appealed for the restoration of earlier freedoms, he has been rebuffed as one vainly trying to revive outmoded ideas. When, in a community with a democratic form of government, he challenges the justice or practicality of a particular decision of the official political majority, he is represented as rejecting the principle of majority rule; and when his reasoning in behalf of freedom runs counter to the reasoning of spokesmen for a particular religion, he is sometimes charged with exalting reason above faith.

The present-day criticisms of liberalism are varied (often mutually contradictory) and they issue from various sources. Some identical criticisms are made by groups that are frequently regarded as sharply opposed to one another in their ideas about man and society and the ways of governing a community. Thus fascists and communists are alike in describing liberals as deluded idealists or incompetent intellectuals. Spokesmen for these groups are emphatic and sweeping in their rejections. Both reject the idea that private citizens can have rights against political rulers. Both disparage free, "objective," inquiry as a means for discovering truth about either the physical world or about man and society; and both regard freedom of discussion as useless for arriving at any viable consensus in the political community. Said Oswald Spengler: the liberal's concern for individual or minority rights and freedoms leads only to "blindness," "cowardice," and "spiritual indiscipline;" he described the modern liberal as either "bourgeois" or "plebian" and said he meant both of those words to be understood as "terms of abuse." Lenin said that freedom of criticism usually amounts to "freedom from every thought-out theory," and he called the liberal an "arm-chair fool."³

There are a wide variety of criticisms offered by writers who are somewhat more moderate in their disparagement and who operate more clearly within the general limits of our western tradition. Some of these criticisms appear as items in general appraisals of the modern western mind; others appear in a systematic consideration of liberalism as the most characteristic feature of the modern mind. Some of these writers are friendly critics, offering warnings against what they regard as the liberal's exaggerated statement and application of his liberal negations and affirmations. Others regard the present-day political liberal as essentially wrong: wrong in advocating the wrong policies, because he concerns himself with matters that have no essential relation to the major problems of political life; or wrong in resting his policies on insecure moral and spiritual foundations, with wrong ideas about man's natural needs, motivations, and capacities, and about man's ultimate spiritual dimensions. In each of these groups, a wide variety of attitudes is displayed towards modern liberalism and the modern liberal, as indicated by the variety of descriptive terms they employ. Liberalism, they say, has become an essentially "negative," "neutral," "middle-of-the-road," "stereotyped," "mechanical," doctrine; or it is a "dogmatic," "pretentious," "aggressive," positively "dangerous," doctrine. The liberal, they say, is "a-moral," "secular," "religiously indifferent," "anti-religious;" or he is too much the "perfectionist,"—"self-righteous" and "priggish" in his appraisal of political policies. Thus also the liberal is variously identified by these critics as distinctively "sentimental," "idealistic," "romantic," "utopian," "intellectual," "academic," and "nineteenth-century." Some of the critics—conceding that there were once virtues in the characteristic liberal doctrines (suitable for the period in which they appeared), yet regarding those doctrines as no longer useful or safe—offer the consolation that liberalism, having done its essential negative, destructive work, is now destined to "disappear."

This paper will deal with two groups of critics of liberalism, considered as a set of ideas about the rights of man in a political community.⁴ The two groups have sharply opposed ideas as to just how the liberal is wrong in such matters, and also as to the intellectual and moral levels upon which a discussion of such matters can be profitably conducted. Professors Willmoore Kendall and J. Austin Ranney believe that the liberal wrongly interjects moral considerations into a political discussion; and that he is thereby specifically wrong in regarding individuals and minorities as having inviolable rights in a democracy. Reinhold Niebuhr, T. S. Eliot, and Professors John H. Hallowell and Sebastian

De Grazia regard the liberal as wrong in leaving moral (and theological) considerations out of his political discussion; or that he is wrong specifically in trusting to an assumed natural reasonableness and ingenuity and spontaneous goodness in man as the adequate foundation upon which to construct a policy for making human rights secure in the political community.

II. THE "MAJORITY-RULE DEMOCRATS"

Professor Kendall objects to the liberal's advocacy of "rights" in a political community—of freedoms, that is, which are natural to man, and which, accordingly, citizens ought to demand and rulers ought to acknowledge and protect.⁵ Such a discussion, he contends, irrationally mixes moral with political ideas, violating "the frontier that divides political theory from ethics." Political theory, as Mr. Kendall defines it, is "value free." Advocating the values of free speech, religious freedom and fair-law enforcement, belongs only to other disciplines, such as "ethics and theology." Political theory deals with the efficiency of means for the realization of political ends, not with the consistency of such ends or means with man's more basic values or preferences. It is concerned with "the method by which political decisions are to be made," not with the reasonableness, justice, or morality of the decisions.

Mr. Kendall objects particularly to the liberal's attempt to combine a discussion of the rights of individuals or minorities (other than the right to take part in making political decisions) with a discussion of democracy. "Democracy," properly understood, is the name for a form of government. It means government by "the people"; and this means, in practice, government by a "majority of the electorate," since unanimity among voters is never attainable. Thus, Mr. Kendall continues, a democrat may properly be called a "majoritarian." "The majoritarian is the man who finds the majority principle more congenial to his values than any other, but the finding on this is, or should be, value free." "The problem a democratic community faces is, as it seems to us, merely that of deciding in what persons amongst us our democratic values require us to lodge its power." Discussing "the merits of the majority's (i.e., the community's) setting aside the traditional civil liberties has no more place in a discussion of the majority principle than a thesis regarding the merits of an economy's producing dum-dum bullets would have in a discussion of the pricing system."

Thus "democracy," in this majoritarian political theory, means "absolute," "unlimited," majority rule. If there are limits on a majority's rule, some other group, "outside" the majority, has to define the limits and the methods of applying them, and you then have rule by a minority. "In a democracy the last word must be with the majority." The American people, declares Professor Ranney, have in vain wanted both "majority rule and inviolable rights." We can't have both: we have to decide "whether democracy to us means majority rule or minority rights"; minority rights "means" minority rule. In a democracy, Professors Ranney and Kendall jointly declare, "no political decisions should be made by any body smaller than fifty per cent plus one of all its members." "The only restraint upon popular majorities consonant with democracy is such a sense of self-restraint as those majorities happen to possess."

To make the government of the United States the sort of democracy described by Professors Kendall and Ranney would require radical changes in our constitutional system. Professor Ranney lists the following necessary changes: abolishing staggered national elections, the equal representation of the states in the Senate, and Senate filibusters. Further changes would have to be made, it would seem, if the majority is never to be restrained by a minority. Thus to make Congress—and the presidency also, if we are to have more than one agency representing the majority—more nearly the representative of a bare majority, we would have to do away with all special majorities, change the present apportionment of the vote for President, and provide for a nationally defined suffrage and a national policing of the elections; and then, in order to give unlimited governing power to these bare-majority representatives, we would have to abolish, or let majorities in Congress or in popular referenda abolish or ignore, all the constitutional guarantees against governmental interferences with the traditional civil liberties.

This argument for unlimited majority rule is aimed particularly at the "judicial veto" as it operates in the enforcement of the constitutional guarantees. You don't have democracy, Kendall says, if you have a supreme court "armed with a bill of rights that forbids the majority to do certain things." "No form of government," Ranney and Kendall jointly declare, "in which the popular majority is checked by some other agency (such, for example, as a court exercising the power of judicial veto of legislative acts), external and not responsible to the majority, has any legitimate title whatever to the label of 'democratic'." Although in a given democratic community there may be certain traditional, commonly assumed and accepted, standards generally followed in appraisals of the rightness of majority decisions, it is still, in a genuine democracy, only a bare majority that decides what the standards mean, in their political applications, and when and how they are to be applied, or when and how they are to be changed or abandoned.⁶

The foregoing indicates the reasoning of the majoritarian in excluding from political theory all discussion of rights in a democratic community, except the right of "political" equality—i.e., the right of every voter to participate equally in the community's decision-making process. Yet Kendall admits into his theory most of the specific freedoms which the liberal treats as rights. He agrees that certain freedoms are necessary as means for obtaining majority decisions. A majority-rule system must have the proper "institutions" for forming majority decisions, with "guarantees" that use of the institutions will be available to all who are to be counted in the process of arriving at a majority decision: "Since the majority-rule democrats do not believe that the people can be counted upon to produce a majority will except where certain conditions are satisfied, they insist upon institutions calculated to facilitate the emergence of such a will (popular education, ventilation of public issues before the widest possible audience and with fullest guarantees that all points of view will find expression, such freedom of organization for political parties as will assure a maximum of competition between them for majority support, etc.)."⁷ A majority puts an end to majority rule if it prevents existing minorities from growing into new majorities.

Here the majority-rule democrat may appear to be adopting liberal political ideas. But this is only an appearance. Admitting the right or necessity, in a democracy, for a free exchange of views and for freedom of assembly and organization, is not injecting moral or liberal ideas or "values" into political theory. For such freedoms, in the majoritarian's theory, are only means, not ends; you can't have democracy without them, but they are not essential rights; and an existing majority can, through the proper democratic procedures, decide to destroy them, thus exercising its unlimited power by deciding to end majority rule; or it may unwittingly make decisions that bring about that result. Democracy, in Mr. Kendall's words, can "commit suicide." It is in this way that the majority-rule democrat keeps himself "intellectually" safe on the political side of the barrier he has erected between his politics and his ethics, holds on to his dogma that democracy means unlimited majority rule, and sticks to his judgment that liberals talk non-sense when they talk about inalienable rights of individuals or minorities under a democratic form of government.

Comment on the majoritarians. It seems proper to insist that in a political discussion the word "democracy" should be used to identify a form of government—a location of "highest" decision-making authority—and not as the name for some humane governmental policy. The former has been the prevailing meaning of the word since the Greeks started, in the fifth century, B.C., talking about the desirable results that might be achieved by placing political decisions in the hands of "the people." A government in which a few rule in the interest of the many may be called a good government, but not, in a proper political vocabulary, a democracy. It also seems proper to say that democracy means "majority rule" since that is as near as we ever get to rule by all the people. It may be agreed also that democracy means "unlimited" majority rule, in one sense of the word "unlimited" as it is used in political discussions. The most ardent advocate of "inviolable" and "inalienable" rights of individuals and minorities understands that a ruling group can violate these rights; and he knows that in any government there is some formally designated person or group of persons possessing an authoritative "last word." Even in states in which the ordinary governing bodies rule legally only within limits set forth in a written constitution, there are other constitutionally designated bodies that can legally abolish those limits. In this familiar meaning of unlimited ruling power Professor Ranney is correct in saying that if the American people want democracy they can not have inviolable rights—i.e., rights that the finally deciding "majority" may not legally violate. That majority can legally deprive any individual or group of life, liberty, and property by any means it chooses, and make the deprivations effective to the full extent of whatever coercive or persuasive powers it possesses.

It may be agreed, finally, that political theory is not altogether theory about "values." As a special technical discipline, political theory can be said to consist of objective, "value-free," descriptions and explanations of observed regularities in the relations among political events; or of deductions from postulated premises about political behavior, or of generalizations based on a rational weighing of the best available evidences in this field. That sort of political theory (or political science) can be useful in appraising governmental forms and activities in terms of their efficiency in realizing stated preferences concerning the location and scope of governmental power. These preferences may be derived from various sorts of basic values and modified by various experiences in the pursuit of the values. A political theorist of this sort is not obligated to look into the meaning of the values. If he offers only to give advice to a community whose values (whatever they may be) lead it to want a government organized and operated in conformity with the wishes (whatever they may be) of a relatively large number of the members of the community, he may properly confine his efforts to pointing out the ways whereby such a people—given their particular capacities and habits and the limitations of their particular environment—are most likely to get that sort of government. It thus seems proper to say that political theory of this sort or to this extent is (or ought to be) "value-free."

To agree to the foregoing definitions—of democracy as "majority rule," of a majority's "power" as, in an important aspect, "absolute," and of political theory as, in some aspects, "value-free,"—is not, however, to agree that this excludes from a rational political discussion all consideration of the values that appear to determine a preference for a democratic form of government, or all consideration of the desirability of establishing judicially applicable limitations upon the powers of the ordinary policy-declaring bodies in a democracy. The meaning of a preference for a democratic form of government is rarely fully indicated by a specification of the number or qualifications of the people who are to take part in making the final decisions. There are different kinds of majority rule, and a desire for one kind does not commit anybody to a desire for another kind. Plato and Aristotle (discussing democracy as a form of government) set forth what they regarded as the essential differences between a "pure" democracy, in which the majority rules in the interest of all the people and in accord with traditional customs or unwritten laws of the community, and a "corrupt" democracy, in which the majority rules in its own interest and without regard for those higher obligations.⁸ Similar evaluations appear in many of the later classical statements of political theory. Thus ideas on majority rule are combined with ideas on inalienable rights in the theoretical systems of both Locke and Jefferson.⁹

James Bryce and Ernest Barker also (both cited by Ranney and Kendall as writers who properly treat democracy as a form of government) have these "mixed" ideas about democracy. Each specifies the ends that majority rule must serve if it is to fit his conception of a rational preference for a democratic form of government. Bryce explained that by "democracy" he meant rule by a majority that safeguards "independence of thought," and a "free play of the intellect," permits the expression of "unpopular opinions," and bears with opposition "because it has faith in the victory of truth." "Not less than any other form of government," said Bryce, "does democracy need to cherish Individual Liberty."¹⁰ Said Barker: A democracy that "rests merely on the will of numbers rests merely on force. If we keep the name and the idea of democracy, we must find some other basis. . . . It is not the majority, as a majority, that matters. It is each human being, as such." The "essence" of democracy, Barker continued, "what matters," is a majority that seeks "full development of personality and individuality," tolerates "differences in doctrine," encourages "discussion of competing ideas," and intervenes in the life of the individual "with a restrained and cautious hand."¹¹

Most systematic discussions of democracy (as a form of government) consider the desirable limitations on majority rule. Most of the present-day democracies have written constitutions containing provisions designed to restrain the powers of bare, temporary, majorities: orders and prohibitions intended (in Bryce's words) to operate as "mitigations of the faults to which democracy is liable." "The annals of democratic governments consist largely of an account of the various expedients resorted to for this purpose," said Bryce. He discussed, in this connection, the familiar expedients of indirect election, upper legislative chambers, over-lapping terms, and "checks and balances" (including judicial review) in the distribution of governing powers.¹²

Why should a community, having a general preference for majority rule, be debarred from choosing the means it considers most useful in making majority decisions more generally acceptable and effective? The American Congress seems traditionally committed to the belief that a "judicial veto" is a useful means to this end. At various times, Congress has been urged to enact or initiate measures designed to destroy or limit the judicial veto. In rejecting or ignoring such proposals, Congress may be reflecting some sort of a persistent popular opinion that legislative decisions will be more willingly and intelligently observed if we retain this safeguard; a belief that with the veto—as it operates in retarding, warning, yet not finally frustrating, a popular will—we are more likely to have the sort of community best fitted for long-run majority rule.

Bryce (describing our judiciary as "in fact and in name an independent branch of the government side by side with the Executive and the Legislature") said that he regarded our use of judicial review, in placing certain matters "out of reach of legislative or executive action," as one of our most significant contributions to the "practical art" of democratic government. The American people, he said, had "resolved to put certain rules out of the reach of temporary impulses springing from passion or caprice, and to make these rules the permanent expression of their calm thought and deliberate purpose. It is a recognition of the truth that majorities are not always right, and need to be protected against themselves by being obliged to recur, at moments of haste or excitement, to maxims they had adopted at times of cool reflection."¹³ Other commentators, here and abroad, have described this feature of our system as a successful experiment in the limitation of governmental power in a democracy.

In insisting on rights the liberal does not mean that rulers cannot violate rights; he means, frankly, that rulers ought not to violate rights. The liberal recognizes the necessity of having somewhere in the governmental structure a "last-saying" authority. As a democrat he recognizes the necessity of placing that authority in the hands of a relatively large number of the sane adult citizens. He acknowledges the citizen's moral and rational obligation to obey governmental commands which his conscience and reason may condemn as violations of rights. The liberal is not a philosophical anarchist; he does not advocate either active or passive resistance to law enforcement. He understands that majorities as well as minorities have rights. None of this, however, commits him to the conclusion that if you want majority rule you can reasonably attach importance to the protection of rights only insofar as the exercise of such rights operates as a means for the formation of majority decisions. And none of this commits the liberal democrat to Professor Kendall's apparent belief that if you criticize any political opinion held by the majority you are presuming to substitute your own "values and lights for those of the people" (or "the majority of the people"), and thereby renouncing any consistent belief in democracy as a form of government.

Discussion of the proper scope of governmental action—of matters to be controlled and matters to be left free from control—has usually been regarded as a proper part of political theory, no less important than the question as to who should rule. Ideas about powers to be exercised and freedoms to be respected by a ruling majority have rarely been sharply separated from ideas about the ethical status of majority rule. Ancient, medieval, and modern political theorists have attempted to explain the values implicit in the political preferences of a people and to show how far and in what ways they can be reconciled with one another. Values may lead to a desire for both majority rule and inviolable rights, with guarantees that majority rule will not be used to destroy other freedoms we value. We give up the full achievement of some preferences, in part, in order not to thwart the achievement of other preferences. Thus a "value-free" political theory is likely to be of limited utility for a people strongly influenced by values. Rule by a majority that undertakes to rule without understanding the values that influence the attitudes of substantial minorities is likely to become impotent majority rule. Minorities as well as majorities exercise power in a democracy. Thus, said Bryce (still discussing democracy as a form of government): "Every people that has tried to govern itself has recognized the necessity for precautions against the errors it may commit, be they injurious to the interests of the State as a whole or in the disregard of those natural or primordial rights which belong to individual citizens."¹⁴

The liberal insists that these rights should not be disregarded. He believes that rights to religious freedom, freedom of speech, and fair trials should be acknowledged and protected by his government, even at the cost of accepting what the Greeks called "counter-devices" in a governmental system. It seems to him strange to say that people who want majority rule cannot regard as inviolable the freedoms that make majority rule possible and durable; and strange to say that people cannot reasonably desire both democracy and the conditions that make democracy desirable.

III. THE RELIGIOUS CRITICS

With the critics now to be considered, disparagement of liberalism forms part of a general lamentation over the moral and spiritual degeneration of modern society. In their specific criticisms, some of these critics approve main items in the liberal program for political action, while rejecting liberalism as a political philosophy; others reject both the philosophy and the program. The common idea in these criticisms is that liberals are wrong or ineffective in their political policy because they have not understood the nature of the evils with which political action deals. Conceiving man as by nature reasonable, magnanimous, and cooperative, the liberals have believed that existing injustices, discomforts, and insecurities in the political community can be corrected by benevolently motivated, rationally devised, institutional reforms.

¹⁴ Modern Democracies, Vol. 2, pp. 390-91.

They fail to realize that our misdeeds and mistakes, in public as in private life, are natural and persistent manifestations of man's innate sinfulness and irrationality.

Perhaps the lengthiest and most emphatic criticism of liberalism, on religious grounds, is to be found in the works of a theologian most sympathetic with liberal aims. Reinhold Niebuhr—a progressive, humanitarian, internationally-minded theologian—has set forth, in several books, his ideas as to why the liberal's schemes for bringing freedom, justice, comfort and peace into the world, have achieved so little. Organize and plan, the liberal says, in his pleas to good and reasonable men: redistribute wealth; educate the masses; use our vast material resources and technical knowledge in eliminating disease and raising the standard of living for everyone; abolish tyrannies and set up democratic governments everywhere; reduce armaments and establish world tribunals for the peaceful and impartial settlement of international disputes. Such hopes, Niebuhr says, are vain. Good plans are futile unless they are undertaken by men wise enough to understand the depth of man's unwisdom and with a moral enlightenment that enables them to realize the strength and pervasiveness of human sinfulness. These views are best summarized in the following quotations from two of Niebuhr's books:

The utopian illusions and sentimental aberrations of modern liberal culture are really all derived from the basic error of negating the fact of original sin. This error . . . continually betrays modern man to equate the goodness of men with the virtue of their various schemes for social justice and international peace. . . . Obviously there are varying degrees of sin and guilt and some men and nations are more guilty than others of disobedience to the heavenly vision. Also there are specific evils in history, arising from the specific maladjustments in social and political organization. But these evils can be dealt with most adequately if men do not give themselves to the illusion that some particular organization of society might be found in which men would no longer stand in contradiction to the law of their being.¹⁵

The assumption of rationalists in the past centuries has been that either education or the equalization of economic interests would finally fashion the mind into a perfect instrument of universal and absolute knowledge, and would ultimately destroy social friction by eliminating the partial perspectives which prompt men to assess social issues in conflicting terms. But this assumption fails to recognize that the most intelligent and disinterested person can never escape his fate as a child of nature and finitude. . . . Thus even the most refined spiritual achievements of humans can never result in an unqualified synthesis of human hopes and aspirations. At some point they will always accentuate social conflict by making men more stubborn in the defense of their interests, under the illusion that their interests represent universal values.¹⁶

Niebuhr has recently illustrated these views, about man and his history, in a special study of the ironies of our American experience. We have demonstrated in a special way, he believes, an irrational faith in reason and a moral blindness to man's inherent immorality. The Puritan and Calvinist settlers believed they were creating "a new heaven and a new earth." The Constitutional Fathers, and we, their heirs, have continued to trust in our superior virtues and talents in making new beginnings in a corrupt world. Here then are some of the ironies in our actual achievement: a nation of greatest productive efficiency, we are involved in a global controversy threatening wholesale destruction; disparaging materialism, we have been its most expert practitioners; having achieved a high state of economic security at home, we are involved in unprecedented global insecurity; having made ourselves the world's most powerful nation, we are yet forced to accommodate our most fateful decisions to the demands or needs of other nations. "A nation with an inordinate degree of political power is doubly tempted to exceed the bounds of historical possibilities, if it is informed by an idealism which does not understand the limits of man's wisdom and volition in history."¹⁷

Niebuhr repeats these views in several of his books. Man, he says, "cannot rise to a simple triumph over historical fate." Our natural will to survive becomes a constant search for security, which in turn is transmuted into a competition for power and superiority. Sin, ignominy, and misery are our lot on earth. Yet this fervent pessimism by no means leads Niebuhr into any advocacy of negativism or passivism in his attitudes towards political action. For man, Niebuhr explains, is a complex being: a part of "nature" and involved in its limitations, yet also outside nature, and able to understand and appraise and in some measure transcend those limitations. Goodness and dignity are, in some measure, our lot. Sinful in his "original" nature, man can yet seek to become righteous; he faces the never realizable yet never escapable command to "be perfect." To qualify himself for making a better among the imperfect choices, he must first put himself in the proper moral and spiritual state. He must recover the traditional Christian virtues of acknowledging and repenting of one's sins. And he must try to understand the complexities of human history—"the limits of all human striving, the fragmentariness of all human wisdom, the precariousness of all historical configurations of power, and the mixture of good and evil in all virtue."

Thus repentance, rebirth, and a search for understanding are key words in Niebuhr's moral commandments. But so also is realism. The ¹⁷ The Irony of American History (New York, 1952), p. 143.

Christian must be practical; ready to choose the less over the more imperfect choices available to him at any given time. Indeed Niebuhr's criticisms do not actually separate him from liberals in the efforts to achieve justice and peace and make human rights secure. He agrees that citizens have fateful decisions to make; political reforms to be striven for actively and courageously. Thus the fault of liberals appears to be (in Niebuhr's diagnosis), not that they have rejected moral criteria, but that they have failed to qualify themselves, spiritually and intellectually, for a genuine application of moral criteria. The liberal's illusions about the possible scope of moral achievement at any given time often result in net losses for morality.

T. S. Eliot's criticisms of liberalism appear in several of his essays and short books. Like Niebuhr he believes that the typical defects of modern society are to be found in an exaggerated faith in human "reason" and "perfectibility" and in the lack of a religion or of any other sort of basic belief.¹⁸ Our ordinary political distinctions today, between the democratic and the totalitarian countries, rest, Eliot believes, on nothing very significant. Indeed the totalitarian countries might be said to be more democratic than the democracies, since their policies may reflect a clearer popular will. The democracies and the dictatorships are alike, however, in their essential secularism. In a few of the western countries (Spain, Portugal, and Ireland) religion retains a slight hold. For the rest, the real division is between the pagan countries (communist and fascist) and the neutral countries (e.g., the United States, France, the British dominions, and possibly England). The pagan peoples have at least the virtues of not pretending to be religious and yet of having some sort of positive beliefs, however shallow and inconsistent. The neutral countries have no philosophy of any sort; to call them "Christian" is "an abuse of terms"; for they are Christian only in the sense that "no one is penalized for the formal profession of Christianity."

Both democracy and liberalism are, Eliot believes, typical manifestations of the degeneration of the modern West. He has little that is specific to say about democracy, and regards the word as now devoid of concrete definition; it means too many things to mean anything. "If anybody ever attacked democracy, I might discover what the word meant." Liberalism, Eliot agrees, once meant something concrete and valuable. In early modern times the beliefs we associate with that term supplied a useful negative element in the prevailing ideology and policy, counteracting old abuses by actively opposing an active, coercive intolerance at a time when the disputants were in essential agreement in their general religious and moral ideals. Present-day liberalism, Eliot believes, serves no present-day needs. It has, like democracy, become a spineless creed, lacking any beliefs strong enough to stand up against the diabolic faiths of racism, class war, and the selfish imperialisms of capitalism and revolutionary socialism. Or if either democracy or liberalism can be said to have a religion, it is the religion of materialism, "the worship of profit." "Democratic liberal society, assembled around nothing more permanent than a congeries of banks, insurance companies, and industries," has no belief in anything more essential than "compound interest and the maintenance of dividends." The cure for this modern disease of the West cannot be found in good intentions and secular institutional changes. There must be a change in beliefs, or a change from non-belief to belief. "If you will not have God you should pay your respects to Hitler or Stalin."

The western world, then, Eliot believes, can be saved only by religion; and only by the right religion, which is (for the West) Christianity.¹⁹ And, like any other religion, Christianity must be authoritatively set forth and actively propagated, under political auspices. The liberal idea that religion is "a matter of mere private belief and that Christians should be able to accommodate themselves to any world that treats them good-naturedly, is becoming less and less tenable": the Christian God is "a jealous God." The restoration of Christianity requires the restoration of Christian institutions. A Christian society must be founded on a Christian political philosophy; and it must be organized in such a way as to promote a wide understanding and acceptance of the Christian hierarchy of values. This does not require the adoption of any one of the traditional "forms of government." The form of the government of a Christian society may be a monarchy, aristocracy, or democracy, or a "corporative state" of the sort described in encyclicals of Pope Pius XI. "To identify any particular form of government with Christianity" is to confound "the permanent with the transitory, the absolute with the contingent."

Eliot's scheme for a Christian organization of society consists of "The Christian State," "The Community of Christians," and "The Christian Community," and an established Christian Church. By a "Christian

State," Eliot means "the government" (in the ordinary sense of the word): the "rulers" (directors of policy) and the whole personnel engaged in the work of legislation, administration, and law enforcement. The rulers do not have to be believing Christians: they may be infidels in their private beliefs, but they must govern as Christians, conforming to "the temper and traditions" of a Christian people; they may "frequently perform un-Christian acts," but must "never attempt to defend their actions on Christian principles." By a "Community of Christians" Eliot means an elite gathered from among clerics, teachers, and intellectually and morally superior laymen; the function of this group will be to help bring Christian principles into education, public policy, and the private economy. The "Christian Community" is the general body of citizens in whom the Christian faith has been ingrained; for this group—"the masses"—Christianity will be essentially a matter of unconscious habit, with ordinary people conforming as a matter of course to established religious observances and traditional patterns of Christian behavior. The form of an established Christian Church, and its relation to the state, might vary in different Christian countries; but everywhere its function would be to speak with "final authority" in the interpreting matters of faith and morals.

Eliot recognizes the difficulties in the way of establishing his Christian society anywhere. Actual tendencies in social behavior—exaggeration of the profit motive, exploitation of labor, and an unfair distribution of wealth—are, he believes, carrying society in the opposite direction. Few will dispute that "a great deal of the machinery of modern life is merely a sanction for un-Christian aims." Although Eliot in such passages indicates a humane interpretation of Christian economic principles, he by no means identifies this with any vision of a social democracy. There is a frequently recurring idea, in his various works, that an efficient, responsible Christian society must be made up of "classes"—each with its special traditions and culture and its special contributions to make to the total culture of that society; and each, accordingly, with class and local as well as general, national, loyalties—all subordinate to the stabilizing force of Christian traditions of belief and behavior.

By the "idea" of a Christian society, Eliot has no notion of a society that ever was or ever would be; he was, he explained, using the word "idea" in its classical sense of "the conception of a thing which is given by the knowledge of its ultimate aim." The Christian social goal may, he feared, seem undesirable to most of the present-day intelligentsia, perhaps "intolerable" to "the liberal mind." Neutral societies may persist indefinitely. But, he believes, "if the present-day peoples are to develop any positive culture of their own"—in other words, if they are to have any culture at all—they “must proceed in the direction of a pagan or of a Christian society.” In either event, he believes, liberalism has spent its force, played out its historic role. Its distinctive attitudes and beliefs “belong to an age of free exploitation which has disappeared; and our danger now is that the term may come to signify for us only the disorder the fruits of which we inherit, and not the permanent value of the negative element.” Whether religion or paganism prevails, liberalism, Eliot believes, is “destined to disappear.”

Professor Hallowell finds confirmation for his own views on the futility, or the positive evils, inherent in modern liberalism, in the writings of various representatives of “Protestant Neo-Orthodoxy,” chiefly Niebuhr. He restates, with emphasis, the view that liberalism’s basic defect is its ignorance or repudiation of the essential Christian doctrine of original sin.²⁰ He attributes to traditional liberalism the extreme view that, since man has natural inclinations to deal reasonably and amicably with his fellows, progress is “automatic,” “inevitable,” and “irreversible.” And then, through a special application of the familiar argument that extreme affirmations lead to extreme contradictions, he assigns to present-day liberals a large share of responsibility for the irrationality and violence of the mid-twentieth-century totalitarian regimes. Overconfidence in man’s reasonableness and goodness becomes an exaltation of will over reason, which leads to the triumph of evil over good; trust in the strength of the normal man’s natural desire for freedom ensures the victory of the abnormal, power-seeking man.

Professor Hallowell cites two sorts of examples of this fateful transition from liberalism to totalitarianism: the legal theory of some German jurists, setting forth their explanations of “positive” law (as distinguished from natural law and moral law); and some public statements by prominent men who, in the mid-nineteen-thirties, spoke in praise, defense, or extenuation of Hitler’s acts.

The legal positivist defines “law” (the law of a state, that is, which is what the jurists are talking about) as consisting of commands issuing, directly or indirectly, from the “sovereign” in a state—that is, from the person or body or bodies of persons formally designated as having final authority to make the laws to be enforced by the government of that state. The dangerous fallacy in this legal doctrine, Hallowell says, is that it treats as law every formally proper command issuing from such a source, however unreasonable or unjust the command may be. Thus the legal positivist, typical representative or product of the modern liberal mind, ignores, or leads others to ignore, all distinctions between good and evil, reason and unreason. The legal positivists thereby, Hallowell declares, "teach that might makes right."²¹

The defenders of "Hitler's terror," cited by Hallowell as examples of liberalism's baneful influence, are James W. Gerard, Hans Rothfels, and Winston Churchill. Gerard said that Hitler unified the German people, improved the education of German youth, rid the country of communism, curbed parliamentary government (a form of government not suitable for Germans) and created a "Spartan state"; Gerard described these achievements as "all good." The burden of Rothfels' defense or apology was that anyone was "pharisaic" and "self-righteous" in passing judgment on Germany's "mistakes" without having experienced the hardships the Germans had suffered. Churchill, praising Hitler's "courage" and "perseverance," said he had always hoped that if England were ever defeated in a war, the English people would "find a Hitler to lead us back to our rightful position among the nations."²²

Professor Hallowell believes that our political ideas should be founded in the spiritual and moral principles revealed generally in the Greek-Hebraic-Christian tradition. He finds those principles set forth best by St. Thomas Aquinas and St. Augustine, and he follows Niebuhr in urging liberals to acknowledge their sins and proclaim their repentance. He summarizes his own version of essential Christian principles, upon which our political beliefs and policies should be based, as follows, in the last sentence of his book:

Only if we are concerned about the salvation of our souls shall we be of much use in saving the world, only if our eyes are focussed on the Kingdom of God shall we see with clearer vision what needs to be done here and now, only if we surrender our wills, as completely as men can to the will of God, will we be enabled by the power of God to make the self-sacrifice which the salvation of the world demands—in short, only by aiming above the world shall we succeed in mastering the world.

Hallowell had explained that he did not mean to exclude consideration of necessary reforms in the structure of our economic and political life. He means rather that no institutional reforms are likely to achieve anything of essential value unless they are undertaken with the perspective and principles provided by Christianity. We cannot obtain peace, security and happiness in this world unless we seek "first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness."

Professor Hallowell's somewhat more specific statement of the proper principles upon which to found a Christian social order consists chiefly of quotations from the late William Temple, Archbishop of Canterbury. Temple summarized his basic principles as follows: Man is not "wholly" ruled by reason, and we cannot remove social injustices merely by reforming our social institutions; yet "civic action" is necessary in the social application of moral principles; recognition of the need for "social fellowship" must be reconciled with a respect for the worth of every person, "absolutely independent of all usefulness to society"; and society must be organized in such a way as to give to every individual "the widest extension of personal responsibility."²³ These views, approved by Hallowell, do not seem essentially different from the views of the liberals criticized by Hallowell.

Professor De Grazia regards "toleration" and "the absence of community" as the characteristic maladies of modern civilization. Under the final triumph of the "notion of the Individual," which "has agitated the Western world since the deaths of Alexander and Aristotle," we have lost all sense of the need for "common belief systems" and the "religious and political bonds" that create a community and hold it together.²⁴ We have now sunk to that condition in which people feel united with their fellows only in "war and crisis"; for only in such tragic situations do most of the people gain a "feeling of community." To make this feeling a normal part of life we must restore the political community to its rightful place and function. We must shift the center of our political interests from "individuals and classes and their mutual antagonisms" to the people united in "the Great Community"—"the state," which "embraces all other communities." This community must be sustained by a body of common values, with "moral authority," and by a recognition of "the close psychological connection and mutual support of religious and political ideologies." The state is "the highest secular association because like its counterpart, the religious community, it exists to protect man from his greatest fear—isolation."

De Grazia assails modern liberalism for its advocacy of toleration, which he describes as the enemy of morality as well as of community.²⁵ He lists, as representatives of this immoral doctrine of tolerance, outstanding names in the Anglo-American liberal tradition—from Milton, ²³ Ibid., pp. 689-91, quoting from William Temple, Christianity and the Social Order (London, 1942).

Roger Williams, and Locke to J. S. Mill. He regards Mill as the worst of the lot, since Mill (De Grazia says) advocated complete tolerance of every kind of thought and pursuit. De Grazia calls tolerance a "radical immoral force" and (borrowing a name from Martin Luther) "a sly whore." Tolerance, he continues, "working silently," has "turned the tolerator into a twilight man and the tolerated into a pale disbeliever," reducing "communal moral standards to a burnt-out hulk." He believes that Mill's ideas foster a "forced variety"; and he states his own belief that "it is always better to be right than to be different."

De Grazia's alternative to tolerance is not intolerance (which he regards as, like tolerance, a "counterfeit"), but "forgiveness," which he defines as "the promise and act of receiving the errant person back into the community." The "right to forgive" must be the special prerogative of "those who have the authority to lead, to guide, to watch over the community." The rest of the community should demonstrate their disapproval of bad ideas and pursuits by communicating their "moral disfavor" through "ridicule, rebuff, irony, contempt, avoidance, cold silence," and other "bloodless forms of moral expression."

Comment on the religious critics. Mill did not (the present writer believes) belittle the value of consensus. He said: "As mankind improve, the number of doctrines which are no longer disputed or doubted will be constantly on the increase; and the well-being of mankind may almost be measured by the number and gravity of the truths which have reached the point of being uncontested." He did warn against an over-emphasis on consensus and against the dangers in governmental coercion as a means of securing agreement. And he did put a high value on individuality and originality. There will always, he said, be the need for persons who can "discover new truths . . . and set the example of more enlightened conduct and better taste and sense in human life. This cannot well be gainsaid by anybody who does not believe that the world has already attained perfection in all its ways and practices." And Mill did not advocate toleration of every sort of speech or action. Like De Grazia, he preferred bloodless forms of opposing the speech and action he considered immoral or unreasonable. For "moral vices" and "irrational behavior," he advocated such methods as "remonstrating," "reasoning," "persuading," "entreaty," and (in words strikingly similar to De Grazia's) such forms of "moral retribution" as "reprobation," "expression of distaste," "avoidance," "contempt," and (in extreme cases) "abhorrence."²⁸ Since Mill advocated free discussion as an essential means of discovering truth and securing clear agreement and strong convictions about what is true and right, he would (it would seem) readily accept De Grazia's aphorism that it is better to be right than to be different; as De Grazia would probably agree that it is better to be right than to be alike, and better to be different than to be wrong.

It is difficult to see why either the theorizing of the legal positivists or the praises of Hitler sung by some misguided commentators should be taken as indicative of typical liberal views or as typical products of liberal doctrine. Some legal positivists have been liberal in their general political theory, some have not. There is nothing in the positivist's theory of law (of the sort of law he is talking about) that should make it difficult for him to distinguish bad laws from good laws, and jurists of that school have not hesitated to make the distinction. Certainly, on the one hand, a Christian can recognize his obligation to obey the laws of a state, even those laws embodying commands which seem to him essentially immoral. No state could exist in a Christian community whose Christian citizens acted on the assumption that they were obligated to obey only those laws which their Christian consciences approved. And certainly, on the other hand, there is nothing in the positivist's definition and discussion of law that implies any unusual limitation on the right of a citizen to express his moral condemnation of a law, or any unusual limitation on his right to disobey or resist rulers who rule unrighteously.

It is difficult also to see why liberals should be blamed for the misguided utterances of Messrs. Gerard, Churchill, and Rothfels. Mr. Churchill seemed (to the present writer and to other ordinary liberals) wrong in his praise of Hitler, and wrong ten years earlier in his more emphatic praise of Mussolini; and Archbishop Temple (whom Hallowell commends for basing his political views on secure Christian foundations) seemed wrong in his pleas for cooperation with the Nazi regime and wrong in his warm commendation of Mr. Chamberlain's pact with Hitler.²⁷ The most charitable excuse for such utterances is that the speakers were badly informed as to Hitler's designs. If they had listened to warnings from the liberals they might have been more promptly alert to the signs of Mussolini's and Hitler's terrorism.

Professor Hallowell, in his various charges against the liberals, applies some of his specific criticisms to special sorts of liberals. Thus, he says, "bourgeois" liberals "consider only the material individual"; "extreme" liberalism "denies the existence of divine authority and thus in effect makes every man a law unto himself"; "some" liberals hold "that freedom of speech is unlimited"; and "degenerate" liberalism is "congenial to the rise of tyranny." Yet in many other passages Hallowell appears to regard his extreme characterizations as properly applicable to liberals generally. Thus, he declares, "It was the liberals who taught that might makes right."²⁸

It can be said of any doctrine that it has its degenerate forms. What Hallowell says of some degenerate liberals can be said of some degenerate Christians. There is utility in pointing out the differences between the pure and the perverted forms of a doctrine. But it is difficult to see wherein there is any more justification for saying that liberals teach that might makes right than for saying that Christians teach that illiberal, un-Christian, doctrine.

Literary critics who claim T. S. Eliot as a special teacher and guide have differing opinions as to what Eliot means, or as to how far he intends to speak clearly, or whether his meanings are merely "too subtle for the intellect." Other readers should, therefore, be cautious in stating their own opinions. To some readers Eliot's description of a Christian society and a Christian life seems (in some passages) over-intellectual; too unemotional; preoccupied with structure and ritual, and ignoring experience; callous in its attitudes towards the ordinary lives of ordinary individuals. In some passages he is explicit in ranking thought above feeling, "truth" above experience, Christian "observances" above Christian conduct or a Christian spirit. "The spirit killeth," he says in one place, "but the letter giveth life."²⁹ Here, and in some other places, he appears deliberately supercilious in his comments on equality, tolerance, popular education, and any sort of merely humane public policy. His conception of "sin" as some sort of mystical entity, independent of human behavior, seems to make him indifferent to such secular qualities as kindness, honesty, and diligence. "What is worst," Eliot says, "is to advocate Christianity not because it is true, but because it might be beneficial." His Christian ideal would be realized in "a community of men and women not individually better than they are now, except for the capital difference of holding to the Christian faith."³⁰

Yet in other passages there are (or appear to be) valid admonitions to liberals and democrats; as in his warnings against both a "slovenly," irresponsible, individuality, and the superficiality and short-sightedness in many of our attempts at economic equalization and mass education. In some passages also Eliot shows great respect for individuality and "the rights of personal life." He points out the various economic and social pressures that "steadily diminish the concrete reality of the individual." He opposes any "censorship," political or moral, of art and literature. Although he would provide for public support of the Christian religion, he recognizes the vagueness and irresponsibility in the use of the term "Christian." Many who call themselves Christian, do not, he says, understand or try to understand what the word means. Some who "vigorously repudiate Christianity are more Christian than many who maintain it." And although he would withhold any sort of positive encouragement of dissenters and sceptics, he would let them argue at will. Moreover, he says (somewhat surprisingly), "The Spirit descends in different ways" and "perhaps there will always be individuals who, with great gifts of value to mankind, and the sensibility which such gifts imply, will remain blind, indifferent, or even hostile. That must not disqualify them from exercising the talents they have been given."²¹

Thus Eliot warns against any sort of "totalitarian" democracy, with its insistence on "conformity without respect to the needs of the individual." He is no advocate of the sort of unlimited political authority insisted on by some of the critics of liberalism.

Niebuhr's belief that "nothing that is worth doing can be achieved in our lifetime" seems as much of an exaggeration, and as much of a contradiction of Christian doctrine, as the belief, attributed to liberals, that man can successfully act independently of his history, his environment, and the limitations of his own nature. Liberals have not imagined that man is solely a reasoning creature or always sound in his reasoning or right in his moral judgments; and they do not believe that we can ever find perfect solutions or always achieve partial solutions. They do believe that we can learn something from our failures and from our partial successes, in efforts to remove some of the economic, political, and psychological obstacles to partial successes. They see no good reason why such attitudes should be called "fantastic" or rejected as the useless products of eighteenth-century "enlightenment," "nineteenth-century rationalism," and the "pretentious social science" of the twentieth century.²²

Niebuhr and the liberals he criticizes do not, however, seem very far apart, in their positions on public policy. They should not object to his warnings against self-righteousness in appraising their intentions and against over-optimism in their expectations. In some passages he seems to be urging a sort of mystic pessimism that might lead to despair of any sort of action. But he does urge action. When fortified by a proper understanding of our imperfections, we should act, vigorously, realistically; we should not wait until we are at some never reachable vantage point of guiltlessness. Niebuhr recognizes fully the powerful part we have to play in preserving our civilization from communism, fascism, and our own selfish nationalism and inept liberalism. We must resist Russia's "demonry" as well as our own vanities and frailties.³³ Niebuhr stands with other liberals in urging vigorous action at home in support of religious freedom, free speech, fair law-enforcement, equal protection of the laws, and greater equality of economic opportunity.

²² The Irony of American History, pp. 25, 43, 45, 63, 80.

IV. CONCLUSION

Liberalism needs criticism. A liberal may have exaggerated notions of man's capacity and disposition to think and act justly and intelligently. Optimism may obscure the need for creative thought and imagination. Tolerance may degenerate into indifference and irresponsibility. Confidence in institutional reforms may divert attention from reforms of the mind and spirit. The problem of maintaining intellectual and moral freedom and vigor is not merely a matter of bills of rights and checks and balances. Liberalism, which began with strong moral convictions, has no less need for them now, and moral convictions about rights imply moral convictions about obligations. As the right to property is conditioned by an obligation not to use property exploitatively, so the right to speak is conditioned by the obligation to speak honestly and fairly. "There are no costless rights."³⁴ Liberals should also recognize that in their openmindedness they may have exaggerated notions of the possibilities of freedom and variety. They may underrate the individual's need for participation with others in a community in which there is some basic intellectual consensus and some common devotion to common causes. Philosophers and scientists have reminded us that an individual is the sort of person he is not solely by virtue of his natural endowment and his physical environment, but also by virtue of the sort of conventional relationships in which he finds himself. The standards of conduct and opinions which these conventions express go far towards determining his character and achievement.

The views of some of the critics seem extreme; there are anti-liberal as well as liberal "stereotypes." Few of the criticisms require the liberal to abandon essential ideas in his political theory. He has no reason to object to the characterization of his theory as "mixed" and "middle-of-the-road." It is a Christian doctrine that man is a creature of "competing" dispositions and faculties and that good and evil are "curiously intertwined" in human history.³⁵ Anthropologists tell us that man is subordinate to his society, yet in essential ways independent of it. Political philosophers have shown how governments exercising unlimited power become incompetent and impotent governments.

The liberal does not ignore the pervasiveness and stubbornness of evil in human history. The fact that he may be an earnest advocate of secular reforms is no sign that he feels sure that his reforms will be adopted or that if adopted they will fully or finally solve any problem. It seems an exaggeration to say that there ever was a typically "liberal" belief in "inevitable," "automatic," and "irreversible" progress. In traditional liberal as in traditional Christian political doctrine, the chief reason for the existence of government is found in the need to prevent men from dealing unreasonably or unjustly with one another. Yet it is no contradiction of these beliefs to believe also that normal men know (in Locke's words) that they "should not destroy one another" or "harm another in his life, health, liberty or possessions." And not all Christian theologians make a virtue of exalting doubt and despair above faith and hope. Even Niebuhr agrees that man "is not involved in guilt merely by asserting his creative faculties."³⁶

In all societies, we are told by anthropologists, conformity and dependence are combined with individuality and independence. Societies, Professor Ralph Linton says, "work as wholes"; the interests of each individual are subordinate to those of the group; a "community of ideas . . . values . . . habits" holds the group together. "It is this psychological and emotional unity, the esprit de corps, which ensures common emotional reactions and makes the individual willing to sacrifice his own interests to those of the whole and to do the things which need to be done even when there is no one watching him." Yet also "No matter how thoroughly the persons who compose a society may have been trained, they remain individuals, distinct psychological entities," who "retain the capacity for independent thought, feelings, and action"; and these "alternatives," in thought, feeling, and action tend to become more "plentiful" and "varied" in the evolution from primitive to civilized societies. "All life in society is a compromise between the needs of the individual and the needs of the group, and it has the indefiniteness and instability of all compromise situations."³⁷

There are special difficulties in the compromises that have to be made between the need of a government for power and the need of the citizen for freedom. "The via media," T. S. Eliot says, "is of all ways the most difficult to follow. It requires discipline and self-control, both imagination and a hold on reality. In a period of debility like our own, few men have the energy to follow the middle way in government."³⁸ Whatever utility there may be in the bare logic of the argument that there can be no sensible combination of majority rule with limitations on majority rule—i.e., you either have unlimited rule by bare majorities or you do not have a democratic form of government—attempts at the combination are made in countries having governments called democratic, according to the proper definition of that word. Professor Latham discusses the lack of "logic" and "precision" in the opinions of our Supreme Court in applying to acts of Congress the Constitutional command that "Congress shall make no law . . . abridging freedom of speech"; and he believes we "win no real victories in the courts" in such matters. He proposes, as a better way to protect our liberties, that we instruct our legislators "in the limitations upon their powers" and that we vote out of office the "rascals" who violate the limitations. This seems certainly better than instructing our legislators, or the people who elect them, that their powers are not limited and that individuals who denounce the rascals show thereby their misunderstanding of the nature of democracy. The liberal believes that there is moral and political wisdom in the constitutional declarations naming "rights" and "freedoms" that "shall not be violated" and "shall be preserved," and that majorities do not necessarily act irrationally in setting up devices against "absolute" and "unlimited" majority rule. He is in agreement with Latham in the belief that "In the struggle to preserve civil liberty, no protection, however slight, should be discarded."³⁹

The liberal, of the sort considered in this paper, believes in inviolable rights—in freedoms inviolable in the sense that men ought to possess them, not only as means for the realization of other values, but as values in themselves. He regards the rights as natural to man, as a being distinguished from other animals by his faculties of reason, speech, a sense of justice, and a capacity for independent thought and action. He believes that the rights are inalienable in a political community in the sense that a citizen will not disclaim them if he is to retain his character as a citizen; and inalienable in the sense that the community will not take them away if it is to retain its character as a political community. He believes that order and agreement are goods that may be sought extravagantly, by means that confuse or destroy the sort of consensus upon which the security and strength of a democracy depend.

THE AMERICAN IDEA OF INTERNATIONAL INTEREST

THOMAS I. COOK AND MALCOLM MOOS

The Johns Hopkins University

I

Disenchantment with moral abstractions as the hallmarks of enlightened foreign policy has recently revived infatuation with the slogans of "national interest," "power politics," and "balance of power." Until the eve of World War II, these ideas had been recessive—at times moribund—for at least half a generation. Naïve belief in the efficacy of professions of good will, reliance on weak instruments for effectuating simply noble intentions in the complex realms of policy and practice, and contentment with lofty exhortations, had too often become the directives of policy unconcerned with the harshness of politics or the intricate give-and-take of sustained diplomacy.

Since the Republic's inception, statesmen have proclaimed national interest as the firmament on which our foreign policy rests. To that concept they have repeatedly referred as a guide and rationale for action in foreign affairs. Over the years the concept of national interest has been endowed with a varied and changing content. Therefore, interpretation has been a matter of historical, rather than etymological, enquiry. Certainly, a single dictionary definition will not do. Nevertheless, while dominant meanings at different moments and a long-term trend in the development of meaning are alike discoverable, or imputable, the actual meaning in our own day rests largely on the setting of current controversies. A particular concept of the national interest, therefore, is not "automatically" warranted and acceptable by appeal to tradition and great names, any more than by formal definition.

That national interest is a necessary criterion of policy is obvious and unilluminating. No statesman, no publicist, no scholar would seriously argue that foreign policy ought to be conducted in opposition to, or in disregard of, the national interest. To do so would reveal at once internal contradiction, logically and psychologically.

The problem, therefore, is to discover what, at the given moment or through a meaningful period of time, the national interest is. Indeed, a major difficulty is to define the relevant time-span in the life of the nation whose interest is to be assessed, and to decide on appropriate policy accordingly.

At the one extreme, the advocate of case-by-case decision, emphatic that the hands of the policy-maker and the negotiator must not be tied by specific but lasting commitments or by long-term policies, will argue that flexibility also best serves the long-range national interest. To him, that interest, first defined by an enlightened judgment of what will in each case profit the collective whole, is the product of a series of such decisions made on the basis of information at the moment available or attainable. Insurance of continuity and needful consistency in policy come from the partial identification with the national life and the inherent participation and sharing in it, by those who in each case do the assessing. To define a national interest beyond the ever-operative processes of politics and policy is to limit effectiveness in the pronouncement and pursuit of objectives. It is therefore deleterious to the real national interest.

On the other side stand those who, however much they agree on the need for accommodation and on the importance of utilizing perceived opportunity, still feel that coherence in foreign policy is the prime requisite. In their view, policy must be the consequence of a principled formulation of national interest. For such defined principle, though it often appears as a self-denying ordinance of dubious value, in truth furthers the sustained national interest. On the one hand it provides anchorage and creates confidence at home; on the other it ensures predictability abroad, and gives clear warning to other powers as to what this nation regards as vital.

These two concepts of national interest in relation to time, the one stressing immediate expediency and flexibility, the other a defining of principle based on long-term trend and desired projection, are exclusive when taken as absolutes. But they are not beyond reconciliation when themselves viewed as factors and perceptions to be weighted by statesmen in their endeavor to assess the nation's interest.

Yet behind these concepts lurk more profound divergencies. One extreme viewpoint regards the nation as a real being with an independent life of its own. Its development and full realization are held to be the generic purpose of history, and the imposed and necessary duty of the true statesman. The nation, according to this thesis, is an organic being, engaged in a struggle for life, for strength, for the conquest of hampering limitations, for predominance. Its objectives are first to endure and then to expand. The position takes many forms, is expressed in varied terminology, and has different implications as to inclusiveness or exclusiveness. Yet it results, almost of necessity, in the conviction that there is a real and lasting national interest independent of and apart from the interests of the persons who at any moment constitute the nation. To that interest they must, where necessary, be sacrificed. Indeed, their real obligation is to sacrifice themselves voluntarily; or to conceive the whole purpose of their existence as service to, and absorption in, the greater being, the nation, which alone is properly the bearer of interests.

On this view, the nation's interest is survival and strength. Its chief and primary instrument is force. It is independent, self-centered, and concerned with other nations only externally, in the sense that they are regrettable, yet inescapable, constraints on its pursuit of that interest. There is no community of nations, and there cannot be. Yet, because other nations exist, there are international relations, as there must be foreign policy, which indeed on this definition of national interest becomes the highest concern of the statesman. His objects are to ensure the permanence and maximize the power of the nation. That principle makes any action which supports it, whether by the seizure of immediate advantage or the adoption of coherent and predictable policy, equally correct.

In such a setting the national interest is a clear datum. It is not something springing from institutions and interests within the nation, whose relative importance and value is to be assessed and re-assessed, and whose concerns may transcend purely national considerations and cross national boundaries. Yet, manifestly, a nation is not a talking organism; and in practice such viewpoints tend to the identification of nation with state, and state with rulers or government. Hence the national interest becomes defined as what those in power declare it to be; just as their efficacy in gaining and retaining power rests upon their skill in overcoming or reconciling particular and assessable interests by the use and sale of the very myth of a transcendent national interest.

Reaction against this position, among peoples where tradition has intimately related nation and state, has often followed in the wake of democratization. In such instances the tendency has been to regard the state as instrumental and to insist that the national interest which it serves must proceed out of the conscious interests and the free loyalties of its citizens. Yet the centrality of the state, so general a fact of European life, has meant that though the state may be reduced to instrumentality in doctrine and constitutional law, it has remained the locus and expression of a national interest under which specific interests are to be subsumed and subordinated.

On this thesis, national interest was, and is, an affair of statesmanship, to be defined and implemented by statesmen, and to be discovered and given a simple and unified content by purely political arts and processes. The formulation of such interest, and the statesman's task, were no doubt helped by an inheritance of traditional policies, not to mention stereotypes for their popularization and continuance. Politics might be constitutionalized and concepts of a superior national being or of the national interest as the will of rulers rejected. But national interest involved a continuity of principles, relationships, and objectives. That very continuity at once permitted needful flexibility in short-term operations and prevented incoherence through mere opportunism. Men were no doubt persons and the pluralism of group life was a reality. But centralization and citizenship were primary. And, by being largely unquestioned conditions of self and of associations, they jointly encouraged harsh definition of national interest and an acceptance of its paramountcy, just as they limited and directed debate over its content and established beyond dispute the proper organs and persons for its implementation.

II

The American experience has been very different. From the colonial beginnings, and certainly long before the Revolution, many of our leaders were critical of monarchy. Indeed, by Puritan doctrine itself they were antimonarchical, whatever their dependence on the throne for the very bases of their legal existence and their territorial rights. The experience of colonial life in thirteen colonies carved from a wilderness was inimical to centralization, as to a dominantly political loyalty to the state; and later colonial experience with the mother country reenforced these tendencies. The Revolution itself completed the work and fixed an underlying pattern. Henceforth the defining of national interest in terms of the state, whether monarchical or the heir of monarchy, was made lastingly difficult.

Yet, as noted above, the idea of national interest was developed early in these United States, and has remained a touchstone for the measuring of policy. The reasons are easy to divine. The Founding Fathers were both revolutionaries and self-made heirs of the doctrine that statesmanship was the highest, and appropriate, calling of the natural or aristocratic leaders of society. That view had developed out of the Whig Revolution, in which landed and commercial leaders inherited, by default and as the culmination of a revolutionary movement, the major and essential functions once the prerogatives of Divine Right monarchy. As successful revolutionaries, our Founding Fathers were driven to organize public power as they sought lasting safety for their creation. Separating themselves from the country whose legal possession they had been, they were forced to proclaim that, whatever the peculiarities of this country, it was a nation-state belonging to the system of states developed by and in Europe from the Peace of Westphalia on. The new nation so conceived had a claim to status, interests, and policies which it was the task of its statesmen to implement and define. Moreover, as revolutionaries and republicans welding a whole out of separate colonies, they were driven to use the concepts of a nation, a national people, and a national interest for organizing purposes, internal not less than international. It is well to remember that the United States, prior to the French Revolution, was the first country to stress the modern concepts of nationality and national independence, though it happily and long avoided the European corollary, nationalism.

The social and geographical facts of American life, coupled with distrust of distant political authority and function, did not prevent our early statesmen from developing a concept of national interest interpreted by a government endowed with exclusive authority in foreign affairs. But these facts did inhibit any tendency on the part of ordinary men to esteem their loyalty and nationality as primarily political and oriented towards the federal government. Men as citizens might meet their legal obligations thereto, and might bear arms in furtherance of the nation's policies, though until after the Civil War they performed the latter duty with little enthusiasm. Even in our own day military service remains for most a regrettable, though real, necessity which, in the name of national interest, interferes with the normal pursuit of individual interests, ideally held to constitute in their sum the more appropriate long-term interest of the nation. We also note that the now almost irrelevant right of the citizen to bear arms, though conceived as being in the national interest because it provided a reservoir of men trained in the use of arms, was in truth doubly anti-statist. It rested on fear of professional armies, as well as unwillingness to rely on them. For they were usually the instruments of governments which identified national interest with their own conceptions of public power and prestige. It rested, secondly, on a popular sense that a citizen body accustomed to use arms was a wholesome check on a possible official temptation to act oppressively, and to equate official ambitions and convictions with the interests of the people constituting the nation.

In general, Americans have rejected the idea of a nation as a real super-being, endowed with independent life and interests, as they have escaped the European concept of the state. Certainly the view that men should be sacrificed to the one or the other, or to the two in combination, is repulsive to Americans; as is the conviction that public authorities are the primary factors in the formulation of concepts of national interest. There have, it is true, been nationalistic movements in the United States. But, apart from their striking differences from European movements, due in part to the absence of equally powerful neighbors, they have generally been short-lived, and have seldom aroused widespread enthusiasm. Thus the first major movement of this sort after the Constitutional period, severely criticized by transcendentalists and by interests differently oriented in geography and commerce, ended with the deepening of sectional conflict and the defection of Calhoun. The nationalism of the Civil War period and after, though it made a genuine impress on constitutional concepts of the nature of the Union, failed to popularize alien ideas of sovereignty and nation-state. In part this was true because the very forces supporting the Union were anti-statist, individualistic, and voluntaristic. Even the later impact of German ideas in the creation of American academic political and social science failed utterly to convert us to the European doctrines of state and nation, since their proponents were driven by outer circumstances and inner conviction to a defense of liberty, of property, and of enterprise beyond the purview of government or state.

The American regards his government as instrumental. But he does not, like the European who shares this view, propound a simple monistic view of national interest by making the state his central symbol of loyalty and identification. Like Europeans he reverences the symbols of the collective public order, such as the flag. Yet loyalty to his nation, though real and deep, is little related to the panoplies of public life. And the occasions when he does thrill to the acts of statesmen, because they embody the sense and reveal the majesty of his nation, are rare.

Rather, American loyalty tends to center around institutions, from the family outward; around sections and scenery and ways of life; around personal freedom and enterprise; and around neighborliness. These interests may be loosely summed up as the much-vaunted American way of life which, for all its varieties of connotation and despite all abuses committed and selfish interests defended in its name, symbolizes a central core of experience, emotion, and attachment. It is not a statist concept; it is not identified with government; and, though it includes our political mores, it is not, in feeling, political. Yet it indicates the fundamental concerns which it is the national interest to protect and promote.

Foreign policies proclaimed or pursued by statesmen are judged to be in the national interest when devoted to such protection and furtherance. Hence, glory and aggrandizement of the nation-state are not, for Americans, synonymous with national interest. Moreover, because that interest is societal, not political, it is possible to conceive of the state purely instrumentally and, simultaneously, to admit that final, as well as instrumental, satisfactions can come from identification with and sharing in the national interest. This sharing in the national interest may be enjoyed without men being driven to glorify a super-being whose claim is sacrifice, whose usual ultimate instrument is force, and whose chief impact upon its own members is external and impersonal. The point may be made negatively by noting the relative difficulty in this country (as against England and parts of Europe) of associating the basic emotional elements of local attachment—the particular sights and sounds and smells so dear to the poet—with a devotion to political institutions and to sacrifice in furtherance of national policies, whether achieved by means of propaganda or by free and unconscious linkage on the part of individuals.

This peculiar conception of the American self is a product of a long-lived individualism, of local community, of the open horizons associated with the frontier, of the vast range in place and in ways of living of the American adventure. Such pluralistic diversity renders old-world concepts of national interest, with their stress upon power politics and balance of power, meaningless and inapplicable to the American situation.

Admittedly the American concept is more imprecise than these, and it therefore necessitates continuous redefinition and re-compounding. This fact, when combined with the inherent unpredictabilities of our political-governmental system, especially as it relates to foreign affairs, creates difficulties for our own and for foreign statesmen, as well as for the analyst who looks for patterns and formulas. Yet, in the modern world of conscious, awakened and aspiring peoples it has one great potential advantage: the tying of national interest to a fluid way of life. True, it may result in exclusive selfishness from an endeavor to preserve the privileges of that life, products of a combination of favorable circumstances and creative energies. But it offers some hope that America's root concern, its ultimate concept of the national interest, may be the spreading and sharing, with due adaptation and without intolerance, of its societal blessings. We may thereby avoid a narrow and resented search for the magnificence of imperial power, always at last a snare, a delusion, and a pointless sacrifice of persons.

In any event, this American idea, which provides a basis for avoiding a naive utopianism unrelated to the particularities of interest and attachment and a power politics whose course is lasting statism on the one hand and tensions beyond peaceful solution on the other, seems to hold superior promise in a world where world conquest and serene isolation are equally delusive aspirations. Thus in the present bi-polar world, the alternatives offered to lesser powers are acceptance of a totalitarian statism or alliance with a coherent yet pluralistic societalism.

In the realm of international economic relations, however, it is signally difficult to obtain coherence in national policy without lapsing into statism, and while avoiding the dangers of commitment through irresponsible individual venturings. American governmental responsibility for the defense of the nation's interest without means to control the conditions which shaped its contours was the central problem to which Charles A. Beard addressed himself in his The Idea of National Interest. Indeed, the difficulty of achieving a satisfactory solution may have been one of the reasons for his ultimate and peculiar brand of isolationism. He sought, but did not find, a modern equivalent of the earlier Hamiltonian realistic concern with national interest. In Hamilton's day, that interest was to be secured by the protection of American industries, at the time infant, or barely conceived. But the long-term consequence of the Hamiltonian system, combined with the impact of the teachings of Adam Smith and his heirs, has conspired to bring about a purely selfish and isolationist economic individualism internally, and support of a free trade competitive individualism externally, as the development of the Open Door policy attested. In combination, the two created the bases of material prosperity, promoted a release of American energies in enterprise, and provided an extraordinary industrial (as well as agricultural) foundation for American world power.

But the accompanying evils created Beard's prime problem, still far from solved. It was necessary to find an equivalent for Hamiltonianism in the realm of exports, as against imports. Such an accomplishment required governmental interference in a field where the tradition of national interest was one of free enterprising, by individual or corporation, regardless of state considerations. Earlier, such activity had profited the nation. But under the new circumstances, as Beard perceived, some exports might not do so, since they could radically change the power relations of other nations to the United States, as well as kill American foreign markets for consumer goods. Thereby they would both decrease our own internal consumption and lessen the volume of employment. In general terms, Beard's solution was a moral equivalent to Hamiltonianism in the export field. Its essence was to be a governmentally-directed and even governmentally-planned system of exporting goods and capital, carefully devised to protect economic welfare at home. Simultaneously, it was designed to encourage, discourage, and direct, insofar as the United States was able, the economic development of other countries to the extent that they depended on us for capital, for consumer goods, or for markets. The object was to further our own national interest, conceived as stable and secure power.

That teaching, again, was a radical revamping, tailored to suit the conditions of the modern world, of Fichte's doctrine of The Closed Trade State. Fichte had recognized the difficulty of promoting the material and cultural well-being of a people when the productive and distributive bases of their economy were subject to random and unpredictable calculations. Aware of these uncertainties, which were increased by the whims of traders and enterprisers and by the actions and reactions of foreign citizens and governments, Fichte had argued the need for a completely enclosed system of national economic life under state control. The benefits of trade must be exchanged for the blessings of planning, stability, and security. The objective of his design was long-term individual welfare even more than national power. Economic isolationism was the one sure means to prosperity and peace, and so to the real conditions for the development of persons. His was a system of avoiding shocks by minimizing variables.

Such a project, though it would have involved some immediate self-sacrifice, might conceivably have been practicable at the dawn of industrialism; while gains in social justice and in avoidance of mass misery might well have compensated for losses of wealth or of power. Even so, unless the scheme had become the common policy of nations, the one adopting it would in all probability have suffered from insecurity by generating inadequate power, in the sense of potentially available force, as compared to other nations. When Beard wrote, in any event, industrialism was well developed, world trade a long-standing fact. His search therefore aspired to a nationally controlled trade in a world of international economic relations. Dependence on others for various materials, as well as some dependence on foreign markets, made an absolute economic isolationism undesirable, if not impossible. Thus national calculations aimed at adjusting variations in the economic conditions and policies of other peoples became an inevitable factor in policy. The essence of such policy was predictive planning of foreign trade and investment for the protection and furtherance of national economic and political power. It was the latter that was proclaimed as the national interest, defined as exclusive and over-riding, but also by its very statement not truly isolationist.

Beard's formulation of the problem showed a profound insight. Actually the inter-war years revealed a radical contradiction. Economists and economic conferences professedly sought decreased national restrictions on multilateral trade. But tariffs and other forms of state interference with free international enterprise continuously increased. The free trade ideal, to be achieved by the mere abdication of governments in that sphere, was an irrelevance and an impossibility in a world organized under national sovereignties, however interdependent. It was doubly so, given the general development of state social welfare policies and the restoration (and exaggeration) of the primacy of the political. National interests, not less than international interest, did dictate planning and control, under the auspices of major collective units of international economic relations. It was impossible politically to leave their protection and advancement to free, yet national and politically-minded, legal persons, on the supposition of an unaided hidden hand and the doctrine of comparative advantage.

Nevertheless, Beard's solution was a hazardous one from the viewpoint of internal institutions. As subsequent events increasingly proved, it was an impractical solution. For America had to promote its interest in a world where it possessed leadership and the obligations of leadership. Yet it had to compete with a vastly different, and highly aggressive, ideology under conditions where its professed policy, as implemented in practice, became an article for export, and not for home consumption only.

As a Republican devoted to the early American conviction of the importance of statesmanship and the centrality of statecraft, Beard was in no sense alarmed at the necessity, implicit in his doctrine, of a large area of control over the direction of enterprise, where such enterprise might affect the national destiny. Certainly he was not to be numbered amongst those members of the party who defend as primary the right to absence of governmental intervention in their quest for profit and power. He had a profound sense of the American ethical tradition, as he had a yet more profound American national pride. These rendered the aspirations of acquisitiveness secondary and subordinate. Yet he did not squarely confront the statist implications of the course which he advocated. Rather, he accepted, too readily, the view that political and governmental control or limitation of selfish interests would give proper primacy to the national interest (defined as national power) without destroying that liberty of personal and community life which he likewise held dear.

Unfortunately, however, prevalent definitions of national interest, though they combine the insights of Beard and Hans Morgenthau, are in their realism less than realistic. The search for power, and for escape from the delusions of moralizers who believe that the enunciation of fine universal principles is enough, is an insufficient basis for foreign policy in the contemporary world. No matter what the particularities of peoples, there is a shared desire for economic betterment, just as there is a shared aspiration towards increased opportunities for persons to develop and fulfill themselves, however great is the current willingness to forego, or the current incapacity to enjoy, Western freedom. The practicable alternative means to such material betterment are freedom within the constitutional social welfare state or planned industrial development under dictatorship inspired by communist ideology. For better or worse, the United States and Russia are the respective symbols, and the effective leaders and sources, of these ways of social organization; as they are the alternate roads to achievement of the desired objective. Under such circumstances, the consequence of realistic national interest is failure abroad; while at home it leads to the ultimate enthronement of the organic nation-state, with statism as its present-day corollary.

Yet the supreme difficulty Beard confronted, the impossibility of adequate national statesmanship for America as a world power under conditions of private judgment and action in the international economic realm, is not met by noting the inadequacies of his own solution or the related, and greater, inadequacies of a more narrowly political and statist realism. Nor is a neatly compacted answer available. It may be in order, however, to suggest the context for an answer, and thereby to help direct attention to the need for further enquiry and for institutional innovation and development.

The major new perspective on international relations and foreign policy during the last twenty years—a perspective which Beard himself helped to create—is the recognition of the essential unity or wholeness of politics. Foreign affairs have ceased to be exclusively or dominantly a matter of formal political diplomacy, as they have ceased to be shrouded from the eyes of the vulgar. Strictly speaking, there are no longer foreign affairs, wrote Salvador de Madariaga in a discerning tract of 1937, there are only “world affairs.”* For the relations between nations have become a central concern, and a dominating condition, in men’s planning of their lives and the conduct of their business. Again, this development was a necessary consequence of modern intercommunication and of contemporary technology. It was pushed farther by the conflicts of ideology of the period, and the aspirations they betokened. It has been accelerated by wars and threats of wars; though the recent atom and hydrogen bombs have created an over-emphasis on international relations as the first, and often unique, criterion of a nation’s conduct of life.

The consequence of this trend has been an unfortunate drive, of which this country now feels the full impact, towards nation-statism: constitutional democracy tends to abandon its own vision, and to become a totalitarianism without dictatorship. It does so, moreover, under conditions where the survival and minimal security of citizens, of cities, of the earth and what men have created thereon, is the over-riding consideration. Thus other nations, rather than pests or human waste of resources, comprise the immediate danger. Having moved from a condition where others were external and often unimportant, we have gone to the opposite extreme, where involvement with others and the hostile policies of others become the highest, and highly resented, determinant of our own doings and way of life. In some sense, indeed, the extremes meet: foreign affairs as national policy divorced from daily life, and foreign affairs as the essence of daily life, alike tend towards a statist conception of national interest, and a power realism unrelated to moral considerations and to a genuine doctrine of a nation’s international interest. But in the United States, unlike Europe, owing to the chance of geography and the need and opportunity for internal development, the involvement of citizens through foreign policy was formerly casual and occasional: in the main, the concept of national interest was internal and societal, and demands of the state through government rare. Today, on the other hand, such involvement is continuous, nerve-racking, and destructive of the societal nation. The American enterprise is forced, despite resistance and resentment, towards the integral unity of the nation-state under conditions where war is total, and the outbreak of hostilities is always just around the corner.

Nevertheless, the conception of policy and politics, international and national, as one whole of interdependent parts offers a theoretical framework whereby to escape extremisms which lead to glorification of power, governmental power politics, and the imposition of the myth of the nation-state in the name of realism. Conceptualized broadly, it promises a basis for preserving and refining the essential concept of societal nationality to fit modern conditions, with the state as the instrumentality, an approach bedded in the American tradition. Additionally it offers an operational technique for furthering American interests and ideas as world power consonantly with that tradition, with the wider Western and Christian tradition, and with the over-riding criterion of universal ethical principle. At the same time it provides grounds for the avoidance of utopian doctrines of absolute and, of necessity, content-less moralities. Such doctrines offer no substitute for policy, yet create the delusion that they are themselves by mere enunciation adequate policy. Hence they beget the reaction to hard-boiled realism, which we have shown to be contemporaneously unrealistic.

Clues to the philosophical principles which insist that the state is purely instrumental, yet inevitably positive and concerned with the protection and preservation of social welfare in its whole unified range of activities, are not hard to discover within the course of American democratic thought. The individualism which leads to release and effective utilization of men's energies and the institutional pluralism which is so vital a core of American life are hymned in the poetry and prose of Walt Whitman, who intuits their ethical laws and their grounding in native mores, as in the folkways later dear to Sumner. Their philosophical underpinning is to be found in Peirce's and in James' Pragmatism, as these are developed by John Dewey, whose Instrumentalism insists on the diverse democratic public as the ultimate source, and the proper beneficiary, of the nation's interest. Long before these men, however, Tocqueville, in what remains the greatest analysis of the American way of life, stressed its fundamentally societal and sociological character, as against the European state.

Nevertheless, these emphases do not provide adequate grounds for compounding in proper relation the social, political, and governmental, which must be done if public authority is to properly serve the nation's total, and internationally-oriented, interest, as formulated by and for the going American social order. Here the clues, in philosophy and political philosophy, are to be found especially in the teachings of three men: Josiah Royce and, among contemporaries, W. Y. Elliott and Robert MacIver. The first provided an Idealism related to the pluralism and energy of American life, in his doctrine of loyalties which, expanded, permitted a political expression of the people and a statesmanship consequent thereon, yet which avoided, by reason of the over-riding and unifying doctrine of loyalty to loyalty, at once the compromises of narrow expediency and the threats of monistic statism. For that doctrine transcended, yet embraced, the purely political concept of allegiance and obligation.

Elliott, in attacking the modern teaching of political pluralism as at once socially disruptive and to some degree intellectually irrationalist, was quite aware of the dangers and difficulties of the orthodox doctrine of the sovereign state, and even more aware of the anti-intellectualism and inhumanity of organicist corporative concepts of nation and national destiny. Consequently he tried, under the rubric of co-organism, at once to acknowledge the necessity of final political decision as basis for action and to insist on the reality of vital and participating groups and interests in the society, whose diverse drives must be included and harmonized as far as possible in the process of statecraft. He desired to avoid a mere tug of forces without clear outcome in policy or practice. He desired not less to avoid the evils of statism, and the sacrifice of men to the myth of the state.

MacIver is an ardent defender of human liberty and foe of totalitarianism. He is aware of the omnipresence and the necessity of government, and of its inevitable wide range of functions if it is to serve our needs today. Yet, aware of the dangers of abuse of power and of indignities done to men in the name of the state, he has defended the state's high claim and function even as he has insisted that it be an instrument of a more ultimate, more vital, though less precisely definable, social whole.

These ideas, germane to American experience, inspired by the more generic traditions of Western thought, and relevant to the great problems which have confronted men in modern industrial society, clearly provide the bases for a hitherto undeveloped synthesis which will reveal the creative leadership in the American conception and practice of man in society. At home, such a synthesis will provide an adequate rationale for the avoidance of statism and narrowed national interest as a basis for foreign policy, will allow the adequate and appropriate synthesis of governmental integrative function with societal national interest; and additionally will further and underwrite the unification of politics internal and external. Such an outlook will result in a national concept of American international interest which can further and protect the American way of life. Likewise, by its appeal to universal principles of human dignity, embodied in its own practice, it can make an appeal to others. Thereby it may promote real American interest by its manifest relation to their needs and aspirations. Specifically, such a theory will provide grounds on which to combat narrowing and ungenerous isolationism and the isolationist imperialism (if we may dare the paradox) which is so ready an outcome of those so-called realistic teachings of national interest designed to avoid the supposed pitfalls of moral principle as a basis of policy. For it is our contention that the extremes which meet, and have a common root, are not, as Professor Morgenthau would persuade us, isolationism and utopianism, but isolationism and that doctrine of national interest rooted in power politics as selfish national calculation and balance of power, of which he is the most forceful contemporary exponent in this country. At the same time, such a theory avoids also the dangers of that moralistic utopianism which Morgenthau and others rightfully condemn. For it stresses the life of American society, still particular though deeply rich and varied. It accepts man's limitation by time and place. It refuses to accept the monistic ultimates which, when they do not glorify the state, yet promise perfectibility of men on earth.

VI

The issue of institutional implementation remains. That issue is how to get expression of, and consideration for, the insights and interests at large in American society at the points of governmental policy-making and specific decision.

Stated otherwise, it is how to get formulated as a coherent whole the societal concept of the nation's generalized interest. No less compelling in importance is how to avoid a purely government-inspired formulation, executive and administrative—a concept put forth as the United States' national interest, and in due course turned into a statist line in the name of unity, effectiveness, prestige, and power.

At the outset, it is important to emphasize here, more than elsewhere, that perpetual vigilance remains the price of liberty. But the pre-condition of vigilance is the clear perception of the tradition, of its vitalizing force, and of its usefulness. Thereby we may combat in ourselves, in our politics, and in our government, that lack of confidence which goes ill together with American power. Americans can escape the degradation consequent on cynical or hard-boiled realism, which is in truth the degradation of democratic dogma, only by perception of their larger heritage and aspiration. They must reject in the name of their living past an attitude of cowed timidity which in its blustering poorly simulates national strength.

At the political level of party politics and the legislative way of life, Americans should therefore reject the dogma and unwisely self-imposed constraint of the touted bipartisan foreign policy, sometimes questioned as to its reality, occasionally indicated on grounds of partisan expediency, but too little challenged as to its ethical goodness. Such a policy is no doubt requisite in times of collective emergency, of clear and present danger to the national whole. It is also appropriate, if defined as intelligent and enlightened abstention from irresponsible partisanship, as loyal support of necessary financial and material means to implement particular policies at the moment in effect, and not in the short run to be changed. The concomitant of such support, however, does not involve abandoning criticism of those policies or unwillingness to suggest and struggle for the adoption of constructive alternatives. Beyond emergency and magnanimous loyalty, bipartisanship becomes a failure to transmit and transform into dynamically fluctuating policy the major elements which collectively constitute the societal national interest; and so it is abdication of a major brokerage function of the party system. For, whatever the ceremonials of formal partisan voting, the total processes of legislation and of executive-legislative relations are not such as to have as their normal end-products laws or policies which represent a strict majority view and majoritarian attitude, with the minority utterly at loggerheads, excluded from consideration, and outragedly rejecting in toto the actual decisions made. Fortunately, American constitutionalism goes deeper than formal checks and balances, judicial review, or guaranteed rights. To abandon party planks, party alignments, and party debate in the realm of foreign affairs is in truth to lose the advantage of dynamic and organic continuity in policy, to achieve at best a static and uncreative unity, to forego the confidence which comes from vital debate, and to sacrifice the enlightened national feeling to what is at root a statist line. For the vital center is only vital when it is emergent from the interplay of diverse interests which voluntarily, and perhaps unconsciously, share an over-riding common concern. Imposed as political duty, and by the eschewing of free debate, that center is in fact devitalized, as it is in its consequences deleterious. Moreover, on the thesis here proclaimed that foreign and domestic policy are facets of one whole, partisanship in the one and bipartisanship in the other constitute on their face a ludicrous position, impossible to maintain for long. If it could be maintained, moreover, it could be executed only at the price of a pointless and harmful incoherence in total policy.

Bipartisanship constitutes in essence an internal appeasement which, in its lack of courage and conviction, can be more harmful than external appeasement. It does so whether it involves the following of administration policies by the minority party or that curious developing brand of "me too-ism" on the part of the majority, of the executive, or of the relevant administrative departments under the executive, evidenced in the endorsing and proclaiming of allegiance to opposition doctrines of national interest and preachments of policy. In the realm of policy, moreover, it begets an extreme oscillation between appeasement and aggressiveness in our dealings with other nations. Nor is this result accidental. For bipartisanship, which developed out of crisis and constitutes a superb democratic equivalent to emergency power and to dictatorship, has encouraged emergency thinking and the conviction of insecurity, and has helped to make them a constant in our lives. In consequence it has contributed to the prolongation of emergency and to the failure to diminish international tensions. For its artificial consensus has, in the name of realism and loyalty, prevented that healthful enquiry and that ability to dissent without becoming suspect.

Bipartisanship helps to create and to strengthen stereotypes which inhibit thought and breed violent emotion. Inevitably it becomes the handmaid of a dogma of utopian catastrophism. Such catastrophism is inimical to effective policy. Moreover, as a substitute for the proper conduct of diplomacy, it is as unsatisfactory as the utopianism of pure and practically undefiled moral aspiration. A return to the normalcy of partisanship in all spheres of politics is a basic need, then, for the effective pursuit of America's international interest. Such a return might also decrease the excessive compensatory strafing over domestic policy and so, by moderation, aid the creation of a real vital center.

At the level of execution and administration, where functional representation and group consultation so peculiarly belong, institutional innovation is especially requisite to avoid the statist concept of national interest. The objective must be to render viable and to harmonize, in a coherent and dynamic pattern of policy, the diverse elements which in their sum comprise the national interest of the American social order. Roughly, what is needed is an equivalent to Calhoun's doctrine of the concurrent majority, divorced from the sectional basis and the narrowed concept of interests of that suggestive teaching. Essentially, the task is to bring into the formulation and execution of day-by-day policy, with due regard to security considerations, the economic, social, and cultural interests first clearly seen as parts of our political order by A. F. Bentley. In this context certain existing organizations which function in our domestic affairs, largely as a result of our present world position and our defense activities, may be relevant by loose, but suggestive, analogy. As an example, local draft boards operating our selective service system might be cited. Local agencies not composed of experts, these bodies of volunteers express the sense and judgment of their communities in the light of determined national needs and under general instructions and specific restraints. Different again, but also loosely relevant, are the War Labor Boards, national and regional, of the Second World War, and the recent Wage Stabilization Boards, with their tri-partite memberships. These brought into decision-making and policy discussion representatives of the two interests, labor and industry, most specifically affected, and of the public-at-large.

Elsewhere, but directly related to foreign policy, the State Department has a special section whose function it is to encourage and inform private organizations devoted to the better understanding of UNESCO and of the American role therein. Here, indeed, the relationship is different, and in form one-way, while the function itself is promotional and informational, not policy-making or administrative. Yet in practice such interchange tends to become one of mutual influence. Even where the intent may be to popularize official attitudes, the outcome is to aid expression of citizen views and to further the conscious spread of concepts of the international interest of the national society. Again, while the widespread practice of using private experts as consultants on policy is very different in intention and impact from functional participation in administration, it tends towards similar consequences. The same applies to the use of qualified private persons on the Voice of America program. In truth, we already possess, however rudimentary in form and inadequate in quantity, some of the practices and operational techniques most suited to attain the dominance of a societal, rather than a statist, concept of national interest.

The remaining problems are, therefore, to broaden and systematize consultation and participation and to create a recognized and institutionalized share in responsibility on the part of the citizen and his representatives. Curiously enough, a return to partisanship in our own international politics and a systematic development of consultation and participation in the development and execution of policy by those affected can actually aid the solution of one set of real problems. Thus some moderates in the name of effective diplomacy seek a return to the realism of the old European balance of power system, even though they are in no way enamored of the doctrine of amoral national interest. These critics have seen a connection between a moralizing utopianism which has often degenerated in practice into a "holier than thou" attitude on the part of America, and the false democratization of politics through the appeal and organization of mass media. Such media, dependent on lowest common denominator appeals, enthrone the simplest moralities and indignations. And in the sphere of foreign relations they induce pressure on diplomats and diplomatic conferences, to the frequent detriment of the nation's international interest.

The indictment is largely warranted; and it is psychologically easy, especially for those who have a decent awareness of history, to contrast the present with the past. By a simple, yet logically not necessary association, they relate secret diplomacy by trained diplomats, the balance of power system, and fairly stable peace achieved through unexciting adjustments made without publicity, and consequently without hurt prestige and lost face. They contrast such a climate of action with the present-day conduct of international relations, whether between individual nations or in the collective conferences of the UN, under klieg lights; and the constant tension, indignation, crisis, and conflict which are consequent on a necessity to be absolutely right. Too readily forgotten is the fact that, though the techniques of an earlier diplomacy had much to commend them, the search for open covenants rested precisely on the ground that commitments made in secret by an élite affected the fortunes and the future of citizens whose felt interests as the nation were unconsulted. The system was in truth conducive to the political idea of national interest, and is peculiarly antithetical to the societal concept of international interest, the new and slowly evolved American contribution by example to a better world order. What is more, as politics became democratized, while policy remained untouched by the peoples' hands, there developed a dichotomy between internal and international affairs. For the sake both of internal and international well-being, it is today vital to bring about a new integration, whereby policy becomes one whole.

A return to times past is no solution. The problem is to determine the areas, and define the techniques, for the conduct of calm and unobserved diplomacy by responsible statesmen. In this setting the primary area for open debate and for the general formation and expression of public opinion is the sphere of principle and overall policy. The dominant mass opinion, it should be noted, is not an expression of a societal national interest, but tends towards a power and statist line, at least under conditions of bi-partisan policy. The result is a democratic totalitarian dogma rather than a genuine vital center. Yet the danger involved in secrecy, in absence of publicity, is precisely a statist concept of national interest made and defined by the élites responsible for the day-by-day conduct of affairs. Whether despite or because of intelligent understanding of other peoples, and skill in dealing with them, such élites, unless properly checked, may develop a professional interest which they identify with the national interest on the basis of their rectitude and expertness in its service. It is at this very point that the idea of relating the layman to the processes of policy administration is so significant. For in that role he becomes an informed critic of the unpublicized conduct of detailed negotiations and an insurance against abuse or confusion of different concepts of interest. Simultaneously, he becomes a broker between government and public, and a source of enlightenment which can help diminish the facile dogmas induced and sustained by mass media. Finally the alert layman aids the politician in bridging the gap and diminishing the tension between misguided yet—to the political leader—imperative mass demands and responses and the difficult requirements of our international interest.

Looking at its main contours, American leadership from Bretton Woods to the Korean crisis has at root embodied a recognition that the interests of these United States are essentially international or corporate, not exclusive and nationalistic. It has revealed a consonance between the American antistatist tradition of freedom and statesmanship on behalf of the societal nation, and the aspirations of other peoples to overcome want and to gain political security as conditions for the release of human energies and the enjoyment of human culture. It has demonstrated that today a realistic concept of national interest must rest upon a genuine morality, in theory and practice, of respect for the finite particularity of peoples. It has perceived that peoples share a common humanity. In a transitional stage from old nationalism to new world order, they strive uncertainly, tentatively, adaptively, and yet determinedly, to create institutions and mechanisms for the furtherance within diversity of that humanity. It has proclaimed, however uncertainly, that in such a world the United States, creator of new patterns for the more effective realization of ancient human insights, and possessor of power for leadership, must interpret its national interest as international interest, in a situation where practical success and moral obligation are consonant and interdependent.

This article is dedicated to the more effective pursuit of such objectives. Whether it is better to abandon the concept of national interest because of its unfortunate connotations of exclusiveness, and its availability as a rationalization to forces of timidity which look backwards and oppose interest to morality; or whether it is possible to win the symbol and transform its connotations is, perhaps, uncertain. To believe, however, that, as a strategy, it is desirable to identify the term "national interest," as its leading proponents tend to do, with a search for power and security divorced from moral considerations is, we submit, an unacceptable premise for an enlightened, successful American policy. To reverse this trend, and to orient the concept of national interest toward a genuine morality seems, indeed, a matter of transcendent importance. American national interest must be re-defined as its international interest, under which are compounded the particular and the universal, power and ethics, the realism of idealism. For today security and sharing are interdependent, and the freedom and fulfillment of persons, the central promise of industrial civilization, depends on both.

PARTY PREFERENCE AND ATTITUDES ON POLITICAL ISSUES: 1948-1951

WARREN E. MILLER
University of Michigan

The widespread interest in understanding the political behavior of the American electorate has been served by a number of different methodological approaches. One of the most widely known and used is the analysis of aggregate voting statistics along the lines indicated by the work of Louis Bean. Major problems susceptible to study through aggregate behavioral measures include those related to the consequences of urbanization, population migration, drastic economic crisis or long-term change, or important international developments. Trends in voting behavior and regional differences in voting fall within this type of analysis, with census tract information and political sub-division voting statistics providing much of the relevant data for investigation.

A different approach to the study of political behavior is provided by the analysis of data on individuals, information pertaining to the behavior of identifiable persons. This approach allows flexibility in the ultimate units of analysis. The use of data on individuals not only provides such gross information as the percentages of people forming large groups (Democrats and Republicans, well-informed and poorly-informed) in the population, but it also provides information about various characteristics of these groups within the population. And the criteria by which social or political groups are defined need not be restricted to political boundaries. Data are also available pertaining to intra-group changes which may cancel out or otherwise go unnoticed if the level of analysis is confined to the study of aggregate statistics. Inasmuch as our interest is in understanding (as well as predicting) political behavior, these more subtle shifts are the source of important information about individuals and individual differences.

The development of probability sampling and the refinement and application of sensitive interviewing techniques make it possible to gather data on individuals from which valid generalizations may be made for entire populations or sub-groups within populations. The richness of data about individual attitudes and personal characteristics is enhanced by our ability to employ complex analysis designs which allow us to exercise necessary controls in our search for crucial interrelationships.

Much of the better known work in this area has been concerned with sociological or, more narrowly, personal-social data. A great many characteristics such as age, income, education, religious affiliation, occupation, information level, and population class have been studied as variables related to various aspects of political attitude and behavior.

One of the most forceful studies of sociological factors and their relationship to political participation and party preference has been published as The People's Choice. The key to the orientation of this study (actually two studies, since the second edition of the book reports on both the Erie County study of 1940 and a national sample study of 1944) is provided by the authors' statement that "Social characteristics determine political preference."¹ A careful study of the Erie County research and a recent analysis of similar data gathered by the University of Michigan Survey Research Center suggest, however, that, although social characteristics were used to explain party preference in Erie County, the generalized usefulness of such explanation is limited.² Manipulation of sociological materials has not produced successful predictions of whether or not individuals will vote. Moreover, such techniques for prediction as were devised by the directors of the Erie County study failed in the SRC study to predict the party preference of some 40 per cent of those respondents who did vote.³

The discussion which follows concerns a study which shifts the focus from sociological to social-psychological variables. The use of sociological variables in the study of political behavior must not only be refined, but it must be complemented by the use of some of the other variables which can be expected to play a role in the development of politically relevant attitudes and behavior. Activity such as voting must eventually be studied in the fullest context of all relevant sociological and psychological factors. We shall here be concerned with but one more aspect of this total context: some relationships between attitudes on political issues and expressions of preference for political parties.⁴

Two national surveys conducted by the University of Michigan Survey Research Center provided the data which we shall examine. The first of these was conducted in two parts; the first part preceded the national elections of 1948, and the second part followed immediately after the elections with a re-interview of the original respondents.⁵ The second study was a study of national political and economic issues, conducted in June, 1951.⁶ Both studies contained requisite information in two areas: a) past and current political party preference of the respondents, and b) respondents' attitudes on policies of the national government.

The data concerning political preference in these two studies provided two indicators of party preference. In classifying people as party preferers, each individual was described in terms of both a past and current party preference. Consequently, instead of speaking of Democrats or Republicans or Independents or Non-voters (the four basic categories of preference with which we shall be concerned), we shall, throughout the first part of this discussion, refer to Democrat-Republicans (people who were Democratic in 1948 but Republican in 1951) or Non-voting Independents (Non-voters in 1948 who in 1951 still did not express a definite major party preference) or to the 14 other similar groups.⁷ Information provided by the 1951 attitude study defined the 16 groups in terms of their responses to two questions: 1) "In the last presidential election about half the people voted and half did not. Did you vote?" (If yes) "For whom did you vote?" 2) "If a presidential election was held today, do you think you would vote Democratic, Republican or for some other party?" The answers to question 1 were grouped to form four categories of people: a) those who had voted Democratic, b) those who had voted Republican, c) those who had voted for a minority party, and d) those who had not voted. The answers to question 2 were also grouped to form four categories: the Democratic, Republican, and Independent (plus a few minor party) preferers and the potential Non-voters. Each respondent was thus classified twice, and his party preference was defined as a combination of these classifications, thus producing Republican-Democrats, Non-voting-Independents, Democrat-Democrats, etc. (In each instance, the first of the labels refers to the respondent's 1948 vote, the second refers to his party preference in June, 1951.)

A central problem of the research was to trace the correspondence between party preference and political attitudes. Before doing this, however, it was necessary to develop a summarizing measure of political attitudes. The attitudes to be used were chosen from the same 1951 study of American foreign policy. In that study the following six questions were asked:

1. "In general are you satisfied or dissatisfied with the way the United States has been acting towards other countries?"
2. "Do you think our troubles with other countries are mainly our own fault or not?"
3. "Do you think the people running our affairs with other countries have done a pretty good job or do you think that some other people could have done better?"
4. "Do you think the United States should send troops to help protect Europe against Communism?"
5. "Do you think we did the right thing in getting into the fighting in Korea last summer or should we have stayed out?"
6. "In the disagreements between President Truman and General MacArthur about how to carry on the war in Korea, who do you think was most nearly right?"

The assumption in ordering attitudes on these items was that responses to this battery or any similar battery of questions about national policies would provide an "index of support for the national administration." This index would be a device by which groups of individuals could be ordered; it would be based on the relative amount of support or opposition which members of each group indicated for each separate policy item.³ An index of support for the national administration was constructed by summing the responses for each group of party affiliates on all six national policy issues. The percentage of pro-administration support in each group was then computed by dividing the sum of the pro-administration responses on the six issues by the sum of both pro and con responses.

³ Three means of determining "relative support for the national administration" were tried: 1) the absolute difference between the percentage of the group membership which indicated support for the policy and the percentage of the group membership which indicated opposition, 2) an average rank ordering of the groups derived from combining the rank order of the groups in terms of the percentage supporting an issue within each group

Each group of party preferrers thus received a score based on its attitudinal responses in support of the administration policies and expressed as a per cent of the total number of its attitudinal responses. Following the logic dictated by this concern with only the relationship between the attitudinal commitments and party preference, the "Don't Know" or "Not Ascertained" responses (the responses involving no reported attitudinal commitment) were not used in this scoring procedure.

Table I indicates the first findings when the 16 party preference groups were ordered on the continuum of administration support with respect to the six policy issues enumerated above.

The symmetrical pattern produced by this ordering was one of the most interesting features of the rank order. Also of interest was the apparent demonstration of the efficacy of grouping individuals by party preference in order to bring together people who are homogeneous with respect to political attitudes.

The ordering of the groups of party preferrers by responses to the attitudinal items provided support for one of our most crucial hypotheses. The assumption was made that combining responses to six issues on national policy (issues on which a pro-administration and anti-administration point of view could apparently be distinguished) would provide a pro- to anti-administration continuum. The ordering of groups of party preferrers was interpreted as evidence of a positive relationship between attitudinal commitment and political behavior. To be sure, the precise nature of the relationship was at this point no clearer than was the meaning of the symmetrical array. However, the symmetry of the array reflected a particular structure of types of party preference; and the attitude scores of the groups composing the array suggested that the structure was related to political ideology or attitude structures.

From this it may be deduced that expressions of attitudes on issues of national governmental policy should possibly be considered not merely as attitudinal expressions per se, but also as politically partisan acts. If some common factor of political significance had not existed in the six items used in the test, the relationship between party preference and attitude as illustrated by the symmetrical array of party preferrers would not have existed.⁹

with the inverse rank of the groups in terms of the percentage of each group opposing an issue, and 3) the ratio of the number of group supporters to the total number of the group who took a stand on the issue (which could also be expressed as the ratio of the percentage who supported the issue to the total percentage who took a stand on the issue). Inasmuch as we were concerned only with those members in each defined group of party preference who actually expressed attitudes on the relevant policy items, method 3 was used throughout.

The array positions of these groups of party preferrers could not be readily explained by the available data relating to the personal-social characteristics of individuals. That is, the distributions of age, income, education, occupation, level of interest, information level, religious preference and place of residence (described by five categories on a rural-urban continuum) did not vary among the groups in the manner which would be necessary for those characteristics to be the factors underlying the array. The symmetry of the array cannot be accounted for by any of the above variables.

A possible partial exception to this generalization was found in the age distribution of the ND and NR groups. In these groups, a relatively large number of members were in the 21-24 age group. These were undoubtedly mostly young citizens who could not vote in 1948, but who were taking an active interest in politics in 1951. The young people did not, however, provide the attitudinal responses which placed the entire ND and NR groups in the extreme positions. As a matter of fact, the elimination of the 21-24 age group from the ND and NR groups in the 1951 study resulted in increasing the uniqueness of the attitudinal positions of the remaining ND's and NR's. With the young respondents removed, the ND score rose from 69 to 71, and the NR score correspondingly dropped from 34 to 32 (see Table I).

A review of the political character of some of the 16 groups suggested, however, that the array provides a basis for considering some of the possible relationships between attitude formation and party preference. Two major hypotheses about the relationship between party identification and attitudes on foreign policy have been outlined elsewhere by Belknap and Campbell.¹⁰ Inasmuch as party identification was determined by Belknap and Campbell by statements of party preference in response to question 2 in the 1951 attitude study, above, these hypotheses are relevant to the data under examination. One of the hypotheses holds that "the party serves . . . as a means of instrumenting a point of view regarding foreign policy which [has been] arrived at as a result of a variety of internal needs and external influences (including party activities)." The other proposes that "the party serves . . . as a reference point to which [people] look, consciously or otherwise, for [a guide to] their [own] position on foreign policy questions."¹¹

In accord with the first hypothesis, people who currently approve the various actions of the United States in international affairs will express this approval three or more issues were tested and all of them produced about the same distribution of groups. Some variations were observed in the central portion of the distribution, but it could be assumed that such variance was a product of the decreased reliability which resulted from decreasing the number of issues included in the index. The consistency with which any group of three or more issues produced the same array of political groups can, in fact, be exploited to demonstrate the usefulness of this approach to the analysis of both intra- and inter-political party shifts.

of policy by support of the administration and of the Democratic party; those who oppose American foreign policy will indicate their opposition by active support of a party which also expresses opposition to the same policy, in many instances the Republican party. Conversely, the second hypothesis suggests that once a person has become a Democrat, whether through psychological identification or as a formal member or informal supporter, he will subsequently adopt the Democratic position on political issues, including issues involving foreign policy. The supporter of the Republican party will, in turn, acquire attitudes expressing opposition to the foreign policy program of the Democratic party and administration.

It is to be expected that neither of these hypotheses can serve alone as an adequate explanation of the relationship between attitude and party preference. Rather, we can expect that various types of political change, in attitude or party preference, will be variously related to one or the other of these major theses about political activity.

For example, the hypothesis that support of a party is dependent upon the congruence of attitudes of the supporter and policies of the party may be suggested as an explanation for the array positions of the DR and RD groups of party preferers. To apply the hypothesis, the nature of the change in party preference among the members of these two groups must be deduced, in part, from information not provided by the June, 1951 survey. Of major importance is the fact that since 1948 there has been a change in the leadership of the Republican party. There has also been a diminution of the bi-partisan character of American foreign policy and an accentuation of party differences on foreign policy. Thus, it may be that some of those Democratic voters of 1948 who were not in favor of the policy acts undertaken with bi-partisan support, and some of those Republicans of 1948 who were strong supporters of those same policy actions have since been faced with a change in the political stage upon which they must play. The Democratic voters have been presented with an opportunity to express their dissatisfaction with foreign policy, and they now prefer the Republican party because a leading faction of that party promises policy more in line with their own long-standing attitudes. The Republican voters, in turn, have been forced to switch to the Democratic party to establish allegiance, once more, with a party whose foreign policy is acceptable to them.

The data do not provide direct verification that this explanation does, in fact, apply to a majority of the members of the DR and RD groups. It could be argued, for example, that a random distribution of the 1948 voters could be expected to produce as many party changers as non-changing regulars (assuming that all 1948 Democrats and Republicans chose, at random, to prefer either the Democratic or Republican party in 1951). Some of the party changers who were isolated in this study may have been only those people for whom random, unknown factors were relevant to party preference. A much more precise thesis has been advanced which holds that party switchers are politically uninvolved and uninterested.¹² Consequently, they are given to changing party preference rather capriciously. However, both of these explanations of party switching fail to account for the relative positions of the DR's and RD's in the total array. Attitudinally, these groups are almost as extreme as the regular party members, the DD's and RR's. Had the DR's and RD's been relatively neutral in their attitudes on foreign policy, either the "random distribution" thesis or the "uninvolved and uninterested" explanation might have seemed adequate to account for the change in party preference. The clarity of both groups' attitudinal positions suggests, however, that, for a preponderance of these people, party did serve as an instrumentality, a means of expression, for attitudes on foreign policy.

The discovery that the DD's and RR's occupied extreme positions in the array was not unexpected. These two groups can probably be accurately described as composed, by and large, of reliable "party regulars." Individuals whose involvement in politics is minimal might be expected to avoid admitting either having voted for the losing party in the last election or preferring the party currently (at the time of the survey) under severe, even violent criticism. The RR's did not disassociate themselves from the unsuccessful party of 1948, and the DD's did not disassociate themselves from the party suffering attack from many quarters on many issues. We do not know whether the DD's and RR's wavered or shifted between November, 1948 and June, 1951, but after two major political events, the presidential election and the dismissal of MacArthur, member of both groups apparently maintained a consistent party preference.

DD and RR party preferrers were, moreover, quite homogeneous attitudinally and provided strong support for the foreign policies of their respective parties. Also, it should be recalled that foreign policy was not an overt political issue during the 1948 election campaign. Consequently, although we know nothing of these people's party preference prior to 1948, we can assume that choice of party in that year was not necessarily motivated by attitudes on foreign policy issues. As Belknap and Campbell point out, the highly partisan character of foreign policy in 1951 was unmistakable, and, as Table I indicates, the attitudes of the DD and RR members on foreign policy clearly reflect the newly established partisan positions. Thus, it may in turn be suggested that party served as a guide to, or a source of, attitudes on foreign policy for a preponderance of DD's and RR's.

For the groups not yet discussed, we must be less specific in our speculations about their possible relation to the hypotheses. In support of the "party as an instrumentality" hypothesis, perhaps the most that could be concluded about the ND's and NR's would be as follows: A combination of internal and external changes between 1948 and 1951 resulted in making support of a political party appropriate for the expression of newly salient attitudes on political affairs. A newly perceived importance of foreign policy could, of course, produce an enthusiasm and fervor which would be manifested in a high proportion of party-oriented attitudes. Recently acquired attitudes on politically partisan issues may have pushed the members of the ND and NR groups over the "threshold" of political participation. Choosing parties as vehicles for desired participation could be expected to follow. There are, however, equally valid reasons for assuming that the "party as a source" hypothesis is involved in explaining the ND and NR array positions. In the first place, operationalizing party identification by using only voting or voting intention as evidence of identification is unduly restricting. Although there has been but little study of the phenomenon of party identification, it may be assumed that voting is only one of many possible expressions of identification. At this point in the development of political behavior theory, even "avoidable" non-voting should not be interpreted as an absence of party identification. Despite their non-voting of 1948, ND's and NR's may yet be as strongly identified with their parties as are the DD's and RR's. In the second place, no information is available concerning the reasons for the ND and NR non-vote in 1948. Illness, bad weather, inability to meet residence or other legal voting requirements or a host of less common factors may have prevented voting. By intent and desire, the ND's and NR's may have been Democrats and Republicans, respectively, in 1948 who were not able to vote.¹⁸ There is little reason, on the basis of the examined data, to emphasize the greater applicability of either major hypothesis in explaining the ND and NR relationships.

The DI and RI groups may well be people for whom candidates are more important than either attitudes on issues or identification with party. They are predominantly "Independents," in 1951, who professed to base their hypothetical voting behavior on choice among candidates. They do not share the enthusiasm of their fellow party members of 1948 (particularly the DD's and RR's) for the respective party positions on foreign policy. At this point in time they had not wholeheartedly adopted their parties' positions. But, neither did they seem to be searching for a party to express extreme attitudes; the primacy of a candidate in their choosing of a party does not suggest party implementation of an attitudinal position.

The data considered here and in the Belknap and Campbell article are not inclusive enough, however, to rule out the possibility that a still different combination of the two hypotheses can accommodate the somewhat conflicting conclusions which may be drawn from the two discussions. A most obvious gap in the data to which we have referred stems from the absence of information about attitudes related to domestic policies. Although foreign policy attitudes were clearly related to party preference, the relationship may be a function of a third major variable, namely, attitudes on domestic policy. With this possibility in mind, it can be suggested that attitudes toward such issues as taxation, economic controls, communism in government, administrative corruption, or the welfare state may be the factors responsible for changing or solidifying party preference. There is much impressionistic evidence which suggests that such issues are much more immediately relevant to most voters, are much better known through wider personal contact with taxation and controls or through publicity given to communism and corruption, and may thus play the major role in determining party preference.

The absence of data on the June, 1951 respondents' attitudes toward domestic policies and on respondents' evaluations of the relative importance of domestic and foreign policy issues forestalls immediate investigation of this possibility. If, however, domestic policy is, in fact, more important to the American voter than foreign policy, we might conclude as follows: a) Increased relevancy and saliency of domestic policies have, in recent months, resulted in major attitudinal changes. b) Attitudinal changes related to domestic policies have produced marked changes in party preference. c) Changes in party leadership and the international situation have, at the same time, accentuated party differences on foreign policy. d) Following the domestic policy-inspired changes in party preference, attitudes on foreign policy have been acquired by the new party members.

This argument, however, seems much more appropriate as an explanation of the DR and RD switches or the ND and NR activation than as an explanation of the differential attitudinal positions occupied by the total range of party preferring groups. In fact, to infer that the observed ordering of the sixteen groups of party preferrers on attitudes toward foreign affairs was basically an ordering on attitudes toward domestic affairs is to infer a clear-cut relationship between these attitudes which is seldom demonstrable.

In summary, the data examined in this study and in the Belknap and Campbell study strongly suggest that important relationships exist between party preference and attitudes on political issues. The findings from the present study, in particular, accommodate the hypothesis that the party serves as an instrumentality for points of view regarding political issues which have been arrived at as a result of a variety of internal needs and external influences. The data examined here do not provide other than inferential evidence that strength of party preference, or party identification, is directly related to strength or clarity of attitudinal predisposition; moreover, there is basis for only the most general speculation concerning the dependence or independence of party preference on political attitudes. Some portions of the above discussion, and the tabular presentation throughout the study, draw attention to the possible dependence of party identification on political attitudes. Nevertheless, relationships which might be expected to follow from the hypothesis that party serves to guide people in forming political attitudes were also found to exist in the present study. It may be suggested that whatever conflict there is between the two hypotheses and the two interpretations of the data can be resolved in at least two ways: 1) under varying conditions and circumstances, political attitudes and party identification may be of differential importance to people, and 2) different attitudinal areas (such as those relating to domestic policy or to foreign policy) may, at different times, be of differential importance to people. Further exploration of the relation between voting behavior and intention and party identification, and the gathering of more complete information on respondents' political histories are also of paramount importance.

II

At this point a replication of this analysis was essential. Therefore, before attempting to verify some of the more refined meanings which might be attributed to the major findings, the next step involved exploring similar data from a completely different research project, the study of the 1948 election which was mentioned earlier. Again, six questions on national policy matters were utilized to provide the measure of pro- or anti-administration attitude. These questions were:

1. "Do you think rent control should be kept on or should it be dropped?"
2. "Some people think the government ought to do something to control prices and others say that government controls just make matters worse. How do you feel about that?"
3. "Have you heard anything about the Taft-Hartley Act?" (If yes) "What do you think ought to be done about it?"
4. "In general are you satisfied or dissatisfied with the way the United States has been acting toward other countries?"
5. "Some people think that since the war the United States has gone too far in concerning itself with problems in other parts of the world. How do you feel about this?"
6. "Are you satisfied or dissatisfied with the way our country has been acting toward Russia?"

The questions relevant to party preference were concerned with "usual" voting behavior and voting behavior in 1948. The classification of the November, 1948 respondents was made on the basis of their responses to the two questions: 1) "If you have voted in a presidential election before this one have you usually voted Democratic or Republican?" and, 2) "In this election, about half the people voted and half of them didn't. Did you vote? Whom did you vote for?" The responses to question 1 were grouped to form four categories of people: a) those who usually voted Democratic, b) those who usually voted Republican, c) those who had voted for more than one party or for a minority party and d) those who had not voted before. Since the study was concerned with major party voting behavior, all respondents in category c were described as Independents.

The second phase of the investigation was thus conducted with a completely different sample (although still one representing the adult, non-institutional American population), responding to five different issues (only the question on satisfaction with American foreign policy was asked in both studies), at a time clearly removed from the study first described, 1948 instead of 1951. The same methods were used for constructing the index of support for the administration, and the same general method of defining party preference in terms of both an historically past and a more contemporary expression of political preference was followed. The gross findings are depicted in Table II.

The balanced pattern of pairs of Democratic and Republican preferrers was again prominent. There were, however, apparent changes from the pattern observed in the first study, including the reversal of order of the RR and NR groups, and the shift in relative position of the ID, IR and DI, RI groups. These shifts and inconsistencies may have been a function of unreliably small numbers within the affected cells in one or the other of the studies.¹⁴

Barring the above-mentioned differences between the two patterns, it was felt that the constancy with which the larger groups maintained their relative positions further supported the major hypothesis. Attitudes on issues of national policy did indeed provide the basis for a general scale of support for the national administration. In the two different studies there was a marked similarity of ordering among comparably defined groups of party preferrers as they were ordered on the basis of attitudinal commitments. The content of these attitudes could, in each case, be described in terms of supporting or opposing policy promoted by the Democratic administration under President Truman. It could be assumed that the time interval separating the two studies (two and one-half years) was not a causal factor relevant to this stage of the analysis.

Exploration of the meanings which can be attributed to the array of the 1948 party preferrers is most difficult because the attitudes involved both domestic and foreign policy issues. At the same time, the use of both categories of issues demonstrates that domestic as well as foreign policy issues provide attitudinal continua on which groups of party preferers maintain a particular order.¹⁵ This demonstration encourages the assumption that almost any set of issues on national policy (issues on which a pro-administration and anti-administration point of view can be distinguished) can provide a pro- to anti-administration attitude continuum. The major implication of this is that the meaning of the arrays is possibly much more general than our earlier discussion of attitude content suggested. The analysis and replication may be said to have involved two specific instances of the general case in which a random sample of people ordered by attitudes toward the national administration exhibited a unique ordering in terms of party preference. In other words, in two completely different surveys people's attitudes toward political issues were similarly related to their preference for political parties.

At this point it was suggested that combining data from the two specific cases would serve the function of providing larger N's for many of those groups whose scores had been described as unreliable because they had varied from the expected pattern. The reliability of specific group measures would be improved, and a "standard" array of the party preferrer groups could be established. The two studies were, therefore, combined in the same manner by which items were combined for each of the separate study analyses.¹⁶ The combination did, in fact, substantially increase the size of all groups except those forming the pairs ID-IR and DI-RI.

The general case, constructed by combining the two specific cases from the 1948 and 1951 data, is illustrated in Table III. The symmetrical distribution of the various groups was, of course, to be expected inasmuch as the similarity of patterns in the separate studies provided the justification for the formation of the above combined distribution.

The assumption that deviations from the completely balanced or symmetrical array were the consequences of unreliable data seemed to be affirmed. The only deviations in the aggregate pattern were provided by the two pairs of groups, ¹⁵ The analysis of various combinations of three issues (instead of six), as described in footnote 9, was also made on the data from the 1948 study. The results were comparable in that any three issues whether they were three domestic, three foreign policy, or a combination of two of one and one of the other, produced similar orderings of party preferrer groups. Again, variations of rank ordering were observed in the middle-range groups—but it could be assumed that such variance was a product of decreased reliability which resulted from decreasing the number of issues included in the index.

¹⁶ For example, the DR group from the first study and the DR group from the second study were considered as one group of people. They had in common the experience of shifting from Democratic to Republican preference at some time prior to (or, conceivably, during) an SRC interview. Each member of the group had also responded to six items eliciting attitudes toward national governmental policy. The group had 6N opportunities (where N=group membership) to verbalize these attitudes (and thereby demonstrate political partisanship). The group score was computed as the number of pro divided by the number of pro and con responses. Again the DK and NA responses were not included in the scoring because of our interest in relating attitudes and party preference rather than in relating party preference to the absence of attitudinal commitments.

ID-IR and DI-RI. These groups were not greatly strengthened by combining the data from the two studies, and were each reliably represented in only one set of data.

This "standard" or "aggregate" array promises to be useful in many studies of political behavior. Instead of restricting analysis of political change, i.e., shifts in partisan allegiance or in attitudinal commitment, to analysis of that change which takes place immediately before an election, the meaningfulness of change over longer periods of time (specifically, at least over three or four year intervals) can be studied. Changes such as those produced by election campaigns can be related to changes occurring during the between-election years. The relationship between change in attitudes and change in political behavior can be studied with some assurance that order, not happenstance, and psychological structure, not socio-economic factors alone, underlie both attitudinal commitment and political behavior.

As suggested earlier, attention can also be focused on different kinds of change. Twelve of the sixteen groups of party preferers (all except the DD, RR, II, and NN groups) represented types of change ranging from that related to possible minimal involvement (changes from Non-voting to "Independent" preference) to that related to possible maximal involvement (change from voting for party X to voting for party Y). Although changers have been characterized as the politically disinterested and uninvolved,¹⁷ one of the consistent findings of this analysis was that political change was accompanied, or preceded, by very clear attitudinal commitments congruent with the partisan change. The ND's and NR's consistently were attitudinally the most Democratic and most Republican, respectively, of all groups of political affiliates. The party switchers, likewise, as mentioned earlier, had attitudinal scores that closely identified them with the core of their newly adopted parties.

If further study verifies the apparent stability of the order of groups of party preferers when they are arrayed attitudinally, the information which may be collected on attitudes may disclose much of value about the "politicalness" of suspected issues in party politics. For example, an additional analysis of the 1948 Election Study strongly suggested that while foreign policy was not an overt issue in the 1948 election, the rank and file voters were apparently divided, even then, along party lines on foreign policy questions. By 1951 the partisan differences were much more pronounced, but the change from 1948 was primarily one of degree for many people.

At this point it seems evident that during at least two periods in the past four years, groups of party supporters as defined by two statements of party preference, were uniquely distributed attitudinally on a pro-anti national administration continuum. In projecting future studies greater attention can be given to the search for explanations of the voting behavior of persons within each of the groups forming the attitudinal distribution. This past work can also be used as a point of departure for historical or dynamic studies of voting behavior. The problems of studying changes in voting, changes in political partisanship, and changes in attitude on national policies can be conducted with at least one point fixed for comparison.

A SUMMARY OF THE FINDINGS

It was found that defining party preference by the use of statements concerning past and present political behavior produced groups of respondents which assumed a unique rank order when the groups were placed on a continuum of pro-anti attitudes toward issues relevant to national politics. The rank ordering produced by reference to attitudes toward national governmental policies was observed to be constant (within variations possibly related to the unreliability of small numbers in the groups producing the variations) whether foreign policy issues alone or a combination of foreign and domestic issues were used to elicit the expressions of attitude.

The consistency of ordering existed for two different samples of the national adult population surveyed at two different times, 1948 and 1951. Variations of the kinds of past and present party preferences which could be combined from the data available did not produce significant variations in the ordering. That is, whether past preference was taken to be "usual voting behavior," "vote in 1944," or "preference in 1948," with present preference being either "vote in 1948" or "preference in 1948"; or whether past vote was "vote in 1948" with present preference being "preference in June, 1951"—all of the permutations produced groups which followed the same ordering when ranked by pro-anti attitudes on the selected national policies.

THE IMPLEMENTATION OF THE ITALIAN CONSTITUTION

The new Italian Constitution was written by the 556 deputies the Italian people elected to their first Constitutional Assembly on June 2, 1946. The Assembly approved the Constitution on December 22, 1947, by a vote of 453 favorable, 62 opposed, and 31 absent. After this approval the Constitution was promulgated by the Provisional President of Italy, Enrico de Nicola, and became effective ten days later, on January 1, 1948. Numerous evaluations of the Constitution are available,¹ and it is not our purpose here to duplicate this work. We are concerned solely with discovering to what extent the Constitution was actually in effect during the four and one-half year period following its promulgation and with explaining, if possible, why there has been so much delay in implementing some of its basic provisions.

What we shall find is that some enabling legislation was passed by the Constitutional Assembly in the interim period between the effective date of the Constitution and the election of the first Parliament in April, 1948. Parliament has implemented a few more constitutional provisions, but vast and basic sections of the Constitution are still ineffective, owing to Parliament's inaction. To a lesser degree the administration and the courts are in a position to implement the Constitution. The administration has done little to this end, and although the courts have taken the Constitution more seriously than the other branches of the government their work has often been conflicting and inconclusive. The President's power to implement the Constitution is operative almost entirely in times of emergency or by tradition. Constitutional emergencies did not arise in this period and traditions have not been established; thus the President's effect on the Constitution has been negligible.

Studies in French include Emilio Crosa (ed.), La constitution italienne de 1948, in Cahiers de la fondation nationale des sciences politiques (Paris, 1950).

In order to explain this state of affairs, we must take into consideration how, by whom, and in what political climate the Constitution was written, and the nature of its content.

The members of the Constitutional Assembly were, on the whole, of high caliber. They included distinguished scholars such as the philosopher Benedetto Croce, the economist Luigi Einaudi, the Latin scholar Concetto Marchesi, the mathematician Gustavo Colonnetti, and the law professors Piero Calamandrei, Tomaso Perassi, Costantino Mortati, Giuseppe Dossetti, Egidio Tosato, and Giuseppe Grassi; prominent pre-Fascist statesmen, including former Prime Ministers Vittorio Emanuele Orlando, Francesco Saverio Nitti, and Ivanoe Bonomi; former Foreign Minister Count Carlo Sforza; outstanding Partisan leaders, such as Ferruccio Parri and Luigi Longo; and almost all of the post-Fascist political leaders.

The Constitutional Assembly was dominated by three parties, the Christian Democrats (Catholic), the Communists, and the Socialists. Four other parties, the Liberal, the Labor Democratic, the Republican, and the Action parties, which were also anti-Fascist and basically democratic, were active in drafting the Constitution. Owing to the prestige of their leaders, these four parties had, in fact, greater influence than their numbers merited. The other minor parties were mostly of a reactionary nature and had little influence in forming the Constitution. No single party had a majority in the Constitutional Assembly, and no stable coalition was formed that could impose a unified program. Therefore a separate majority was formed on each major issue. The Christian Democrats were usually the nucleus of this majority, but its other component parts varied according to the issue at stake.

A body of over 500 persons is not well adapted to constitution-making. The Assembly was therefore wise in delegating, on July 15, 1946, the task of drafting the Constitution to a committee of 75 of its members, chosen to represent the parties in proportion to their strength in the Assembly. In general the parties were represented on the committee by their abler men.

The Seventy-five elected as its president the respected jurist and pre-Fascist deputy Meuccio Ruini, a member of the Labor Democrat party. The Committee then divided itself into three sub-committees, charged respectively with drafting the parts of the Constitution dealing with (1) rights and duties of citizens, (2) the constitutional organization of the State, and (3) social and economic rights and duties. These sub-committees elected as their presidents respectively the Demochristian Umberto Tupini, the Communist Umberto Terracini, and the Socialist Gustavo Ghidini. The second sub-committee, which was the largest, was again subdivided to permit the creation of a special section dealing with the judiciary, headed by the Republican Giovanni Conti.

When the various sections and sub-committees had finished their work, the Seventy-five appointed a committee of 18 to coordinate the Constitution and put it into final form for presentation to the Constitutional Assembly. The Eighteen was composed of the presidents of the committee and its subdivisions, of outstanding law professors such as Calamandrei (Action party), Perassi (Republican), Grassi (Liberal), and Tosato, Dossetti, and Mortati (Christian Democrats), and of top political figures such as Togliatti and the Liberal party leader, Marchese Roberto Lucifero. The Seventy-five adopted the re-draft made by the Eighteen with only slight modifications and presented it to the Assembly on January 31, 1947. During the rest of 1947 the Assembly discussed, altered, and after 173 sessions finally approved the Constitution.

The Constitution was not submitted to the electorate for approval. This saved the Assembly from the possible embarrassment of having the voters reject the Constitution it had approved, as had occurred in France shortly before. On the other hand, the Italian Constitution was deprived of the prestige it might have gained through approval by popular vote. Such prestige might have helped it overcome some of the obstacles that are in its path today.²

The provisions in the Italian Constitution can be divided into two categories: those primarily of an institutional nature, which either establish or authorize the establishment of the principal organs of government and describe their functions and inter-relations, and those that state the rights and privileges of Italian citizens and the obligations and aims of the government. The first type is found in Part II of the Constitution (Arts. 55-139). The second type is found in the section of the Constitution called "General Principles" (Arts. 1-12) and in Part I (Arts. 13-54).

Still another classification of constitutional norms must be borne in mind in examining the implementation of the Constitution. Jurists distinguish between preceptive norms (norme precettive) and programmatic norms (norme programmatiche). Preceptive norms are those that are immediately applicable. Programmatic norms are those that require implementation by enabling legislation. Some of the preceptive norms in the Italian Constitution, however, are not effective today and some of the programmatic norms are effective regardless of parliamentary inactivity. Such preceptive norms as those found in the freedom of speech article (21), for instance, are not implemented because Parliament has not repealed certain Fascist legislation still in effect, and the Constitutional Court, which could declare those laws unconstitutional, has not been established. On the other hand, programmatic norms such as those authorizing already existing institutions are effective without further parliamentary action.

The organizational section of the Constitution in the main reestablishes the institutions of the former octroi constitution that Carlo Alberto of Savoy gave his people in 1848 and that became effective throughout Italy as the House of Savoy extended its domain, but it grafts onto this structure a number of institutions and procedures taken from modern democratic theory and practice. The Albertine Constitution, known as the Statuto, was a vague document that could be altered by ordinary legislation. Without being formally abrogated or amended, it underwent drastic changes in 1866 when parliamentary government was established, and again after 1926 when the Fascists began legalizing their anti-democratic activities. Although not in itself tyrannical, it offered little protection against tyranny.

The section provides for five important institutional changes: (1) the abolition of the monarchy and the establishment of a parliamentary republic (Arts. 83-91); (2) the transformation of the Senate from an appointive to an elective body (Arts. 57-60); (3) the establishment of the Constitutional Court (Arts. 134-137); (4) the establishment of regional governments (Arts. 114-133); and (5) the creation of the Superior Council of the Judiciary (Arts. 104-107). None of these changes can be considered revolutionary. Each is in keeping with modern trends and in line with the experience of other western democracies. The President's powers and functions are similar to those of the French President; the Senate is modeled after the Senate of the Third French Republic; the influence of the United States is seen in the Constitutional Court; the example of democratic Switzerland, as well as the doctrine of self-determination, is behind the establishment of regional governments; and the creation of the Superior Council of the Judiciary has the support of a cardinal democratic principle, that of the separation of powers.

Other changes in Part II of the Constitution are equally unrevolutionary and include (1) provision for initiative and referendum (Arts. 71, 75); (2) the new amending provisions, designed to give the Constitution greater rigidity and prevent its being altered by a process indistinguishable from ordinary legislation (Arts. 138-139); (3) the creation of an advisory council on economic and labor problems (Arts. 99-100); (4) the institution of a mild type of presidential veto (Art. 74); and (5) a series of provisions aimed at strengthening the government vis-à-vis Parliament (Arts. 92, 94).

Of these changes, six are primarily of a programmatic nature, and four, the abolition of the monarchy, the amending process,³ the presidential veto, and the provisions aimed at strengthening the government vis-à-vis Parliament,⁴ are preceptive and therefore in force without need of implementation. Of the six which require implementation only two have been implemented, and the second of these only in part. In both instances enabling legislation was passed by the Constitutional Assembly in the interim period between the promulgation of the Constitution and the election of the first Parliament in April, 1948.

Transitory Article XVII of the Constitution empowered the Constitutional Assembly to pass laws implementing three specific constitutional provisions: the Senate electoral law, the charters for the special regions, and the law on the press.⁵ The Constitutional Assembly carried out these instructions.

The election laws have followed the Constitution in most respects. They have established universal adult suffrage (for the Chamber of Deputies) and have guaranteed the secrecy of the vote (Article 48), but the constitutionality of making voting compulsory and recording failure to vote in the Certificato di buona condotta is questioned by at least one authority.⁶

³ Except insofar as the provision for the referendum is not implemented.

The Constitutional Assembly enacted enabling legislation, in this case charters, for three of the five special regions (Sardinia, Aosta, Trentino-Alto Adige) and approved the previously granted charter of Sicily. Although all of these charters differ, and the three written by the Constitutional Assembly give less autonomy to the regions than the Sicilian charter did, their provisions raise no constitutional problems, as the Constitution simply states that these regions are to enjoy a special status as set forth in their charters (Art. 116). The Constitutional Assembly was also justified in not issuing a charter for Friuli-Venezia Giulia, as Transitory Article X of the Constitution states that this region will be treated "provisionally" (i.e., until Italy regains Trieste) as an ordinary region.

The efforts of Parliament to implement the Constitution have been neither strenuous nor effective. Most of the members of the Constitutional Assembly were elected to Italy's first Parliament in April, 1948. This fact led one to expect that Parliament would hasten to enact enabling legislation to make operative the Constitution its own members had written. Such, however, was not the case. The change can be explained in part by the waning idealism and democratic fervor noticeable in Italy by 1948 and in part by the increase in Catholic and reactionary strength at the expense of the minor democratic parties. In the 1948 elections the Communists about held their own with respect to their power in the Constitutional Assembly, but the Liberals, the Republicans and the right-wing Socialists lost heavily. The Christian Democrats, under the leadership of Alcide De Gasperi, won an absolute majority in the Chamber of Deputies and a plurality in the Senate. This was the party that had the largest number of deputies in the Constitutional Assembly and therefore had the major voice in writing the Constitution. Nevertheless, though it has a fine record of achievement in many respects, the De Gasperi government, in its four and a half years' existence, has failed to implement many significant features of the Constitution.

Much of the important enabling legislation would have the effect of reducing the powers and freedom of Parliament. This is true with respect to the five principal institutions which have not as yet been activated: the Constitutional Court, the regions, the Superior Council of the Judiciary, the initiative and referendum, and the National Council of Economics and Labor. Perhaps it is too much to expect mere human beings to be so profligate with their powers as to vote them away, and perhaps one can accuse the Constitutional Assembly of naïveté for assuming otherwise.

The fulcrum of Italy's constitutional system is the Constitutional Court. Without this institution the Constitution cannot function effectively. In spite of this fact, Parliament has taken no final action for the establishment of the Court. A bill was presented in the Senate by the government on July 14, 1948, and passed on March 17, 1949. This bill was presented to the Chamber on April 2, 1949. Over a year later, on April 17, 1950, it came out of committee, considerably altered, and was approved March 15, 1951. After this it returned to the Senate, where a committee drew up a compromise bill for re-submission to the Chamber. Another measure in the form of a constitutional amendment supplementing the brief and inadequate provisions passed by the Constitutional Assembly (February 9, 1948) was presented in the Chamber May 20, 1950, and passed the first time March 16, 1951.⁷

Parliament has not set up the ordinary regions.⁸ Although a bill to this effect, marked "urgent," was presented to the Chamber by the government December 10, 1948, no action has been taken.⁹ This failure on the part of Parliament has led to special difficulties. Since the Constitution specifically delegates to the regions powers over many local matters, Parliament tends not to legislate on those matters pending the creation of regions,¹⁰ or if it does legislate, its acts may be of questionable constitutionality.¹¹

⁷ This bill passed the Chamber for the second time on July 3, 1952 (two votes at least three months apart are required for constitutional amendments) and will now go to the Senate. This amendment deals primarily with procedural questions. It defines, for instance, the manner in which impeachment proceedings can be brought before the court. Such action will require the vote of a joint session of Parliament.

There is an extensive bibliography on the Constitutional Court. See Piero Calamandrei, La illegittimità costituzionale delle leggi del processo civile (Florence, 1950); Eduardo Garbagnati, "Sull'efficacia delle decisioni della Corte Costituzionale," in Studi in onore di Francesco Carnelutti, Vol. 4 (Padua, 1950), pp. 191-213; Michele Petrucci, "La corte costituzionale," in Calamandrei-Levi, op. cit., Vol. 2, pp. 431-64; Alfonso Tesaro, "Relazione sul progetto di legge per la Corte costituzionale," Atti parlamentari, Camera dei Deputati, No. 469A, pp. 1-42 (1950); Ernesto Bruneri, La corte costituzionale (Florence, 1952); Carlo Lavagna, op. cit., pp. 170-95, 429-52.

⁸ For the powers and functions of the region, see Giovanni Miele, "La regione," in Calamandrei-Levi, op. cit., Vol. 2, pp. 225-379.

¹⁰ Massimo Severio Giannini, in some remarks made before the Congresso dei giuristi democratici in Rome on June 2, 1952.

Parliament cannot be held entirely responsible for the inaction and delay with respect to the creation of the Superior Council of the Judiciary, as in this case the government has not even presented an enabling bill. Any deputy or senator could, of course, have presented the bill regardless of governmental inactivity, but such initiative beyond the call of duty is hardly to be expected. In a speech before the Senate on April 23, 1952, the Minister of Justice, Adone Zoli, promised to present a bill for the establishment of the Council before the summer recess of Parliament.¹²

The provisions for initiative and referendum are still inoperative for lack of enabling legislation. A bill presented by the government and passed by the Chamber March 8, 1951, was altered by the Senate and returned to the Chamber January 1, 1952. The committee of the Chamber accepted all of the Senate's changes with respect to the constitutional referendum and the initiative, but it recommended minor variations in the articles dealing with the legislative referendum.¹³

Enabling legislation for the National Council of Economics and Labor was presented in the Senate March 15, 1949, where it passed December 6, 1951, but by July 1, 1952, no action had been taken by the Chamber. This delay has been due in part to differences of opinion on some of the technical questions involved, such as whether or not there should be special sections for economic and labor problems, the number of councilors, and the percentage of technical experts to be included.¹⁴ It is interesting to note that the inclusion of this Council in the

¹² La nuova stampa, Turin, Vol. 8, No. 98, April 24, 1952. The function of this body is to protect the judiciary from undue influence by other branches of the government. According to the Constitution, the Council is to be presided over by the President of the Republic, and the Chief Justice and the Chief Prosecutor of the Court of Cassation are members ex officio. Two-thirds of the other members are elected by the judges from their own ranks, and the other third by Parliament in joint session, from among law professors and lawyers with at least 15 years' practice. Among the functions of the Council are the selection and promotion of magistrates.

A similar innovation was adopted by the French in the Constitution of the Fourth Republic. The Italian Constitution provides for a substantially independent Council, in that the majority of its members are career judges elected by career judges. The majority of the members of the French Council, however, represent the non-judicial branches of the government. (See Carlo Giannattasio, "La magistratura," in Calamandrei-Levi, op. cit., Vol. 2, pp. 169-97, at 179.)

¹³ According to the Constitution (Art. 125), the referendum is not to be admitted in the case of tax bills, amnesties, or authorizations of treaty ratifications. These limitations pose a serious problem, as it will not always be clear whether or not a law for which a referendum is requested falls within the subject matter for which the Constitution permits a referendum. The Constitution is silent as to what government agency is empowered to decide this question. It is proposed to give it to the Constitutional Court by a constitutional amendment. On the specific question, see Roberto Lucifredi, "Il controllo sulla costituzionalità delle richieste di referendum abrogativo," Rivista trimestrale di diritto pubblico, Vol. 1, pp. 128-37 (1951). On the referendum in general see Maurice Battelli, "Le istituzioni di democrazia diretta," in Calamandrei-Levi, op. cit., Vol. 2, pp. 61-78.

Constitution was primarily the work of Christian Democrat leaders, particularly Professor Costantino Mortati and Edoardo Clerici.¹⁵

The Constitution further directs (Arts. 25, 102, 103, and Temporary Art. VI) that within a year of its promulgation the courts martial be reorganized in accordance with the Constitution, and that within five years all other special courts but two (the Consiglio di stato and the Corte dei conti) be abolished. In spite of this directive, no final action has been taken with respect to the reorganization of the military courts, although a bill was presented in the Chamber of Deputies December 18, 1948, just under the legal deadline and just before the Christmas recess. Parliament had until January 1, 1953, to enact legislation absorbing the other special courts into the regular judicial system. The major courts involved are tax courts and admiralty courts. It has been pointed out that there are no political considerations to explain and partially excuse parliamentary inaction in this matter.¹⁶

A bill was presented in the Chamber June 6, 1952, to regulate the powers of the Council of Ministers and its President. This bill attempts to implement and clarify Articles 76, 77, and paragraph 5 of Article 87 on executive orders, and would give the President of the Council the power of determining the agenda for the cabinet meetings.¹⁷

By way of summary, it can be said that the following provisions of Part II of the Constitution are inoperative because of Parliament's failure to act: parliamentary incompatibilities (Art. 65), initiative (Art. 71), referendum (Art. 75), National Council of Economics and Labor (Art. 99), Supreme Council of the Judiciary (Arts. 104-106), regions (Arts. 115, 117-133), and Constitutional Court (Arts. 134-137). This is a total of 29 out of the 84 articles in Part II of the Constitution. Virtually all of the effective articles were operative without parliamentary intervention, either because they contain preceptive norms, which require no enabling legislation, or because the enabling legislation had been passed by previous legislatures. It should in fairness be remembered, however, that the government has presented enabling legislation for the implementation of almost all of the presently inapplicable provisions in this section of the Constitution. There is no sign of a conscious effort on the part of the government to prevent the application of this section; rather there has been a lack of that positive concern necessary to overcome parliamentary inertia. With respect, however, to the section of the Constitution dealing with civil liberties and the ends of the state, the government has not shown even this limited initiative.

The "General Principles" and Part I of the Constitution can be considered together. This section attempts to state the limitations and obligations of government vis-d-vis the people. It comprises an extensive bill of rights that adds to the classical limitations on government common to all democratic constitutions, a series of positive obligations the government is supposed to perform in the interests of the individual citizen, such as free medical care for the poor (Art. 32), free education for the deserving poor (Art. 34), and vocational training (Art. 35). Unfortunately, these are obligations that the state is unable to fulfill, either at present or in the foreseeable future. Some theorists feel that these statements of principle, which are in fact little more than pious hopes, belong in a preamble and not in the corpus of a Constitution.¹⁸ Others feel that since they represent the ends to which the state created by the present Constitution aspires, they belong in the corpus, where they will have a normative value in the sense that they will (1) invalidate any action directly contrary to their provisions, (2) serve for the interpretation and application of other norms, and (3) create a moral obligation on the part of Parliament to implement them.¹⁹

The application of any of the norms in this section is handicapped by the fact that they are often mutually contradictory, the result of compromises approved by different political coalitions. An example is seen in the provisions dealing with illegitimate children. Article 3 reads in part:

All citizens have equal social dignity and are equal before the law, without distinction of sex, race, language, religion, political opinion, and personal or social status.

Article 30 reads:

The law assures to children born out of wedlock all legal and social protection compatible with the rights of the members of the legitimate family.

These provisions do not seem reconcilable with respect to the rights of illegitimate children.

Other serious problems of incompatibilities result from the inclusion of the Lateran Pacts in the Constitution (Art. 7). This article reads:

The state and the Catholic Church are independent and sovereign in their own spheres. Their relations are regulated by the Lateran Pacts. Modifications of the Pacts accepted by the two parties do not require the procedure for constitutional amendment.

Included in the Lateran Pacts are several provisions obnoxious to Western democratic concepts of civil liberties found in the Italian Constitution. Such a provision, for example, is the one that a former priest cannot be employed by the government in a position that puts him in contact with the public—obviously in contrast with the “equal protection” provision of Article 3 of the Constitution.

The incompatibilities between the Constitution and the Pacts, however, extend beyond the question of civil liberties and result in at least one instance in an outright absurdity, i.e., Article 26 of the Lateran Treaty (one of the Lateran Pacts), which states:

The Holy See recognizes the Kingdom of Italy under the dynasty of the House of Savoy.

The dilemma raised by these incompatibilities is resolved by the majority of the authorities by giving preference in cases of conflict to the constitutional provision on the grounds that Article 7 of the Constitution merely establishes that the Lateran Pacts determine the basic relations between Italy and the Vatican, and that specific provisions in the Pacts patently at variance with other articles of the Constitution are ineffective.²⁰

The case for this opinion is greatly strengthened by an examination of the proceedings of the Constitutional Assembly. Amerigo Crispo, one of the Liberal deputies, offered an amendment to Article 7 inserting after the words "Lateran Pacts" the clause "insofar as they are not contrary to the present Constitution,"²¹ but withdrew it on the assurance of responsible Demochristian deputies that "the sole legal significance of this article" was to establish the fact that "of the various possible systems for regulating the relations between state and church, Italy adopts the one that distinguishes between the two powers and coordinates their relations through a bilateral pact, and provides that unilateral changes in this relationship can be made only by constitutional amendment."²² On the strength of this interpretation the Republican Count Sforza voted for Article 7.²³ Also worthy of note is the fact that an amendment by the neo-Fascist Gennaro Patricolo explicitly inserting all the provisions of the Pacts in the Constitution was voted down with the help of the Christian Democrats.²⁴

In spite of the preponderance of authority for this interpretation of the effectiveness of the Lateran Pacts as constitutional norms, the fact remains that their inclusion in the Constitution has increased the doubt and confusion in the minds of many as to the applicability of those parts of the Constitution which are in conflict with provisions in the Pacts.

The implementation of the programmatic norms in Part I of the Constitution might have been made easier if Parliament had established a Constitutional Court, as then the Court could have weeded out the patently unconstitutional articles in Italy's basic codes and laws. Faced by the necessity of filling the vacua left by these judicial nullifications, Parliament might have been forced to revise these laws without delay. The fact that Parliament has not established the Constitutional Court, however, has not relieved it of the responsibility of implementing Part I directly. Transitory Article XVI of the Constitution reads:

Within a year of the effective date of the Constitution, the pre-existing constitutional laws not implicitly or explicitly abrogated will be revised and coordinated [with the Constitution].

The failure of Parliament to implement Part I of the Constitution does not mean that many of its provisions—the so-called preceptive norms—cannot be applied by the administration and the courts. The administration, however, has shown less interest in the Constitution than the legislature. It would appear that the courts have taken the new Constitution more seriously than the other branches of the government. That the legal profession should respect the law more than politicians and administrators is natural. But with Parliament's failure to enact enabling legislation for the Constitutional Court, and with the non-existence of the principle of stare decisis, the regular courts have been powerless to create an adequate and coherent jurisprudence. Many of the major inefficiencies will be alleviated and some will be eliminated with the establishment of the Constitutional Court, but the effectiveness of this court will depend in large measure on the quality of the enabling legislation.²⁵

A few provisions in this part of the Constitution were implemented by the Constitutional Assembly. Article 21 was partially implemented by the law on the press, which abrogated the law of January 14, 1944, requiring authorization

²⁵ The Constitution (Art. 36), for example, states that an act which the Constitutional Court declares unconstitutional will become ineffective the day after the publication of the sentence. Parliament should clarify this provision. If it means that the party to a dispute who claims that the Constitution has been violated can get no redress for his personal grievance, but only the altruistic satisfaction of having helped others, only those persons who can expect to be handicapped in the future by a law or regulation are likely to go to the trouble and the expense of testing its validity. (See Alfonso Tesaro, op. cit., pp. 37-38; Michele Petrucci, op. cit., pp. 456-59; Piero Calamandrei, La illegittimità costituzionale).

by the prefect before publication. The new law²⁶ only requires notification. It retains the Fascist provision, however, that every periodical must have an editor who is criminally responsible for everything that appears in the periodical. In 1952 Parliament was considering the repeal of this article, which some think is incompatible with Article 27 of the Constitution, which reads in part: "Criminal responsibility is personal."

The charters of Aosta (Chapter VI) and Trentino-Alto Adige (Chapter X) guarantee protection to linguistic minorities, and in this way they in part implement Article 6 of the Constitution, which reads: "The Republic protects linguistic minorities by appropriate legislation." A bill to this effect presented to the Chamber December 10, 1948, is still pending.

On June 19, 1952, Parliament passed a bill implementing Transitory Article VII, outlawing the reorganization of the Fascist party. With its approval of the treaty creating the Council of Europe, the Italian Parliament expressed an opinion in accordance with Article 11 of the Constitution, which gives Parliament the right to delegate sovereignty to an international organization.

Although no action has been taken for the thorough revision of the Criminal Code, the Code of Criminal Procedure and the law on Public Security, a number of bills have been presented to abrogate or to revise specific articles of these laws. For example, a bill to abrogate Article 16 of the Code of Criminal Procedure passed the Senate and was presented before the Chamber June 19, 1952. This article provides that no criminal action can be initiated against public officials or members of the armed services for actions performed with the use of arms or other physical coercion, in line of duty, without the consent of the Minister of Justice. Another bill was presented January 25, 1949, marked "urgent," that would annul all the sentences of the Fascist political tribunal (Tribunale speciale per la difesa dello stato). After three and a half years it is still in committee. Two bills were presented to implement Article 30, paragraph 3, which protects illegitimate children. One bill, presented March 15, 1951, by the Christian Democratic deputy Maria Pia Del Canton, would eliminate all mention of the parents' names in government certificates. The other, presented by the Socialist Bianca Bianchi, authorizes public officials to invent names for children whose parents' names are unknown. Since in Italy one has to present documents that among other things include the parents' names, from the first appearance in grade school on through the rest of one's life, this is a matter of some importance.²⁷

A bill implementing Article 16, paragraph 2, was approved by the Senate on March 27, 1952, and approved with only minor changes by a committee of the Chamber June 17, 1952. This bill regulates the issuance of passports. Previously passports could be denied by the government for any motive and without explanation. The bill before Parliament implements the Constitution in that it grants a general right to a passport to all citizens who do not fall within one of eight groups. Included in these groups are persons who have not performed their military service, condemned persons who have not served their sentences or paid their fines, minors, idiots, and workers who want to seek work abroad and who are not acceptable under the immigration laws. This bill would also implement Article 30 in part, as the parents' names would not be included in the passports. From a constitutional point of view the most questionable article in this bill is article 8, which permits the Minister of Foreign Affairs to refuse to issue or to revoke a passport when it "appears prejudicial to the internal or international security of the state." The intention of this article is apparently to permit the government to continue its practice of refusing or revoking passports of Communists who speak against the government when abroad. Although it is difficult to demonstrate the unconstitutionality of article 8 as it stands, it is unfortunately liable to uses and interpretations that violate the spirit of the Constitution.

²⁷ The Bianchi bill passed in the Chamber July 17, 1952.

With the abolition of the corporate system, there has been a large void in Italian law in the labor field, a void all the more felt because of the copious legislation and control in this field under Fascism. The Constitution speaks of "registered" unions, of collective agreements, and of the right to strike (Arts. 39-40). Three successive Ministers of Labor (Fanfani, Marazza, Rubinacci) prepared legislation in this matter, but only the last actually presented his project to Parliament. This bill has been strongly criticized, particularly in labor circles, and many of its provisions are of questionable constitutionality. Informed persons feel it unlikely that Parliament will accept it.

Parliament has not only failed to implement major sections of the Constitution, but in several instances it has also enacted legislation that appears to violate the letter or the spirit of the Constitution. The new law against Fascism, for instance, provides for punishment of public expression of praise for Fascist principles, deeds, means, or leaders (Art. 4). This seems to be in open conflict with the freedom of speech article (21). A bill authorizing pre-censorship of comic books appears equally incompatible with the Constitution's freedom of speech article. This bill had strong Catholic support in Parliament and was fought by the Liberals, Republicans, right wing Socialists and some of Italy's more responsible newspapers, such as La stampa of Turin and Il corriere della sera of Milan. It passed the Chamber without serious difficulty in the spring of 1952, but by July 1 no action had been taken by the Senate. A new bill on the freedom of the press is also under discussion. It is severely attacked by the liberal press for its illiberal and allegedly unconstitutional restrictions.²⁸

The land reform law, one of the few pieces of truly "liberal" legislation that Parliament has enacted in the postwar period, also appears to be unconstitutional. It empowers administrative officials to expropriate land, and classifies this action of the administrators as legislative and therefore not subject to review by the administrative courts. Italy's highest administrative court has denied the legislative nature of these acts, declared its competence to review them, and annulled them as ultra vires, although the acts were admittedly valid under the law.²⁹

Parliament avoided a constitutional question over an alleged conflict of authority between Parliament and the Regional Council for Trentino-Alto Adige. Both bodies claimed the power to write the law for the election of local government officials in the province of Bolzano. The Regional Council, basing its authority on some equivocal provisions in the regional charter (Arts. 4, 5, 54), passed a local election law in December, 1949. The legality of this law was questioned by the Commissioner for the region (the representative of the Italian government, with powers similar to those of the prefect in other regions). On recourse to the Consiglio di stato, the supreme tribunal for administrative adjudication, the view of the Commissioner was upheld. Thereupon the De Gasperi government presented a detailed election bill for the region of Trentino-Alto Adige to the Senate. This body, in a conciliatory mood, passed a sort of skeleton bill, delegating to the regional parliament the authority to fill in the details. This bill was later passed by the Chamber of Deputies as well. This appears to be the first time that Parliament has been called upon to judge the constitutionality of an act, and the legislators avoided the constitutional issues involved by enacting compromise legislation.³⁰

The President³¹ is concerned with the Constitution in at least two ways. His oath of office requires him to observe the Constitution (Art. 91), thus giving him a degree of control over the constitutionality of the acts of other branches of the government that he must sign. He is also required to participate in governmental activities, and by his participation he delimits his own constitutional powers, a point on which the Constitution is not clear. Like many chiefs of state today, the Italian President is legally irresponsible, except for treason or violation of the Constitution (attentato alla costituzione) (Art. 90), and all his acts must be countersigned by the proposing Minister (Art. 89). It is simple enough to follow the Constitution on this point in those cases in which the President's action was proposed by a Minister, but it is hard to decide who must countersign the many discretionary acts the President performs, such as the appointment of the President of the Council of Ministers, the dissolution of Parliament, and the nomination of the five life senators and five of the judges of the Constitutional Court. It seems to be agreed that even these acts must be countersigned,³² but there is a difference of opinion as to whether they are to be taken on the President's initiative or whether he should formally appoint the persons actually chosen by the government. The latter view, incorporated in the Fumagalli amendment to the bill on the Constitutional Court, appears to express the Christian Democrat position on the question.³³ Those who support the President's right to initiative are divided as to whether the Minister who countersigns the nomination has control over the President's discretionary powers or merely over the legality of his acts. The commentators seem to favor the second view.³⁴

In order to support the opposite thesis the Christian Democrat leaders have suggested that the President does not have to accept the government's nominees. Were this view accepted, the President's veto power might be extended by analogy to any governmental action requiring his signature, such as ratification of treaties, declaration of war, dissolution of Parliament, or calling of referenda.³⁵ It is doubtful if the Constitutional Assembly intended to give the President such sweeping power.

The Constitution gives the President a limited veto power. Instead of signing a bill he may send it back to Parliament for reconsideration, at the same time giving his reasons for not signing it (Art. 74). This so-called "suspensive veto" can be overridden by simple majorities of both houses of Parliament. The suspensive veto may be used for bills that the President feels are merely inexpedient as well as for those that he may consider unconstitutional. During his first four years of office President Einaudi used his limited veto power only twice, in the case of bills that were patently unconstitutional. On April 15, 1949, President Einaudi returned two bills to Parliament that were in violation of Article 81 of the Constitution, which prescribes that "every law which calls for new and greater expenditures must indicate the revenue from which they will be met." Again, on January 11, 1950, the President returned to Parliament for further consideration a bill that would give tenure in the judicial system to certain temporary appointees. This bill appeared to the President to be in contrast with Article 106 of the Constitution, which states that members of the judiciary are to be chosen by competitive examination. On reconsideration this bill was modified by Parliament.³⁸

The uncertainties in the constitutional relationships between the President and the other government organs can only partially be blamed on obscurities in the Constitution itself. The judicial status of a constitutional monarch or of a president in a parliamentary democracy is necessarily ambiguous in that it is based on antithetical concepts of sovereignty. On the one hand, there is the fiction of popular sovereignty, delegated by the electorate to the President of the Council of Ministers; on the other, there is the fiction of the sovereignty and the prerogative of the head of the state—king or president—who is not responsible to the people. The powers and prerogatives left to the head of the state in such illogical systems cannot be clearly delimited in a legal document. Their delimitation can result only from compromises sanctified by tradition.

It is impossible in a few pages to give a systematic account of the implementation, and violations, of the Constitution by the administration and the courts. The administration is obviously in no position to implement those parts of the Constitution that are inoperative for want of enabling legislation. Under ideal conditions, however, it might show a greater interest than it has so far shown in governing in accordance with the preceptive norms of the Constitution. No case has come to light where the administration, of its own accord, has formally determined not to apply patently unconstitutional laws, or where it has formally taken into consideration, in making future policy, court decisions declaring such laws unconstitutional. Informally, however, it appears that the police have been convinced that confino is no longer to be applied. Confino is a system by which the police could require anyone to move to an isolated and out-of-the-way place, where he remained indefinitely under strict police surveillance, without judicial trial and without the right of appeal to the courts.

Serious conflicts between the Constitution and the administration arise in the field of civil liberties. A comparison of the Criminal Code, the Code of Criminal Procedure, and the Fascist Law on Public Security with the civil liberties provisions of the Constitution shows the basic incompatibility of these laws and the Constitution. The courts have repeatedly declared certain articles of these laws unconstitutional, without much effect on the subsequent actions of the administration. The continued application of these laws is in part the result of the legislature's failure to rewrite them, but since a large portion of the administrative acts of questionable constitutional validity are discretionary rather than ministerial in nature, many instances of conflict with the Constitution could be avoided if the administration were persuaded that where discretion is involved, the law should be applied in the spirit of the Constitution. This sentiment, far from pervading the administration, has hardly made itself felt.

According to Transitory Article VII:

³⁸ This information was obtained from the Office of the Secretary of the President of Italy.

... pending the creation of the Constitutional Court the regular courts have the power to judge the constitutionality of laws and other public acts in the manner and in the limits of the law as it existed before the promulgation of the new Constitution.

This provision gives the regular courts limited powers with respect to the Constitution. They can do nothing to implement the programmatic norms, which are considered unenforceable on the grounds that they are merely directives to the legislature and are not in themselves legally binding.³⁷ They cannot directly implement the preceptive norms. By declaring laws unconstitutional that are incompatible with the preceptive norms, they can at least clear away some of the impedimenta to the observance of these norms.³⁸ Even this power, however, is seriously limited by the fact that the principle of stare decisis is not admitted in the Italian legal system and consequently the regular courts are not empowered to lay down general principles on the constitutionality of laws and on the interpretation of articles of the Constitution. When an Italian court within the regular judicial system declares a law unconstitutional, the decision applies only to the case before the court, and there is no assurance that other courts higher or lower (or the same court, for that matter) will follow the precedent.³⁹

The result of this state of affairs is that the courts have pecked away at some of the patently unconstitutional provisions in the Codes and principal laws of Italy, preventing their application in single instances; but since on many questions there has been little consistency in the court decisions, there can be little assurance on the part of the public that a future violation of these provisions will be condoned. In other words, the citizen has no way of knowing what his rights and privileges actually are.

The absolute lack of adjustment of the former criminal law to the democratic principles of the new Constitution, resulting in the coexistence of norms which are basically antithetical in inspiration and clearly incompatible in more than one instance, has brought about a crisis in the relations between the law and the citizen, with the result that the citizen's obligation to know the criminal law becomes increasingly difficult to fulfill.⁴⁰

³⁹ In decisions dated May 31, June 19, July 17, July 24, and July 27, 1950, various sections of the Tribunal of Rome held that Article 114 of the Law on Public Security, prepared by the Fascists, prohibiting the printing of photographs of persons who have committed a crime, was unconstitutional because it was in conflict with the guarantee of freedom of the press in Article 21 of the Constitution. On July 1, 1950, another section of the same tribunal convicted the editor of one of Rome's prominent newspapers of violating this article by printing a picture of a man accused but not convicted of a crime, in spite of the fact that Article 27 of the Constitution provides that "The accused is not considered guilty until he has been convicted (sino alla condanna definitiva)."

⁴⁰ These are the words of an Italian judge, Massimo Severino, "Rimpatrio coattivo e costituzione," Il foro padano, Vol. 6, Sec. 4, pp. 103-7, at 103 (1950).

In Italy the judiciary is a career service. Young law students enter it by passing competitive examinations, and often remain in it for life. At first glance it may seem surprising that the young pretors eager for advancement in the service should be more zealous guardians of the Constitution and more ready to limit the powers and activities of the government than the judges of the Court of Cassation, who have reached the top rung of the judicial ladder. Nevertheless an examination of the reported cases⁴¹ shows that the pretor has often been more diligent than his older and more august colleagues on the higher benches in enforcing the Constitution. This diligence may be due in part to the greater degree of idealism and naïveté considered inherent in the young, and in part to the fact that the humble pretor is likely to officiate in a hamlet, where happenings are of little concern to the government in Rome. The judges of the Court of Cassation, on the other hand, sit in Rome. They are older men, less interested in change per se, in constant contact with government leaders, and continually subject to their informal pressure.

The courts have been most consistent in implementing those sections of the Constitution which increase their powers. Thus there has been little disagreement over the enforcement of Articles 111 and 113 of the Constitution, which give the right of appeal to the Court of Cassation from the various administrative courts, or of Article 103, paragraph 3, which limits the competence of courts martial in peacetime to military crimes committed by members of the armed forces.

Much of the work of the courts on constitutional matters in this period has been over the application of laws which appear to be in open conflict with the civil liberties provisions of the Constitution. An examination of a few of the more important constitutional provisions in this field will suffice to show the general confusion that reigns in Italy today. Most of the cases reported have dealt with administrative actions based on Fascist legislation which the present Parliament has not yet modified or repealed and which is in sharp conflict with the basic civil liberties.

Religious freedom is guaranteed by Articles 3, 8, and 19 of the Constitution, which read in part, respectively:

All citizens . . . are equal before the law without distinction . . . of religion. . . .

Relations between the government and the various churches are regulated by agreements between them.

Everyone has the right to profess his own religious faith . . . and perform its rites in private or public as long as the rites are not contrary to public morals.

In spite of these provisions, religious freedom appears to exist in Italy only in the larger centers. The police, at the instigation of local priests, regularly enforce patently unconstitutional provisions of the Fascist legislation forbidding religious activities of non-Roman Catholic groups, such as church services, ringing of bells, and proselytizing. In one instance the local authorities went so far as to forbid a man to have running water in his home on the grounds that he was a Holy Roller.⁴³

In three cases, at least, the courts have enforced the Constitution in protection of religious freedom. The right to hold religious services was upheld by the pretor of San Giorgio del Sannio.⁴³ In a decision of October 26, 1950, the Tribunal of Catania upheld the right to attempt to proselytize for any religious faith whose rites are not contrary to public morals.⁴⁴ The Court of Appeals of Bologna reversed a lower court decision in a separation case, which held that a father who read anti-clerical newspapers and used profanity was ipso facto an unfit guardian for his child.⁴⁵

In general it can be said that the present Italian government has practically refused to reach agreements with the minority religious groups and to issue regulations in modification of the present provisions of the Criminal Code and of many other laws that appear clearly unconstitutional.⁴⁶

Freedom of speech and of the press also have had a rocky road. These freedoms are protected in the Constitution in quite unequivocal terms: "Everyone has the right to express his opinion verbally or in writing" (Art. 21). There have been so many and such conflicting decisions on these matters that only a

⁴⁴ The Minister of the Interior in the Fascist era sent instructions to the prefects interpreting Article 650 of the Criminal Code so as to make it a crime for Holy Rollers to hold religious services. The instructions read: "The Pentecost cult is not admitted in the Kingdom because it expresses itself in rites that are contrary to social order and are harmful to the physical and psychic integrity of the race." Several years later, after the fall of Fascism and the promulgation of the new Constitution, at the instigation of a local priest the prefect decided to break up the Holy Rollers' meetings and so instructed the police. In his decision upholding the Holy Rollers' right to meet, the pretor observed (1) that the instructions were invalid because the Holy Rollers had not been advised of their content, (2) that the instructions were unconstitutional because they were incompatible with Article 19 of the Constitution, (3) that Article 18 of the Law on Public Security, requiring notification of public meetings, was abrogated with respect to religious services. The following extract from the pretor's decision is worthy of citation: "They abandon themselves to shouts, to sudden rough bodily contacts, and to the emission of incomprehensible words. Now, admitting that such incandescence and fanatical collective exuberance (not unknown to the greatest religious movements) may in certain instances and over a period of time upset the nervous equilibrium of the less balanced persons, it would still be absurd to hold that public morals are offended by these meetings . . . to such an extent as to justify their suppression." few of the decisions of the Court of Cassation can be mentioned here. In a decision of January 17, 1950, the Court of Cassation refused to apply Article 113 of the Law on Public Security requiring previous authorization for distributing circulars in public places, putting up wall posters, or using lights or loudspeakers as a means of communication, on the grounds that this law was incompatible with Article 21 of the Constitution.⁴⁷ This decision was confirmed with respect to putting up wall posters a week later.⁴⁸ Less than three months later, however, the Court of Cassation decided that Article 21 of the Constitution was programmatic and not preceptive and that Article 113 of the Law on Public Security was still effective.⁴⁹ Shortly after, the Court of Cassation decided that giornali murali, that is, newspapers printed solely to be posted in public places, are free from the obligations of Article 113 of the Law on Public Security, not because this article has been abrogated by Article 21 of the Constitution, but because of the provisions of Article 10 of the law on the press of February 8, 1948, No. 47.⁵⁰ Three months later, however, the same court decided that only giornali murali, and not ordinary newspapers, can be posted without the previous consent of the police.⁵¹

Article 16 of the Constitution reads:

Every citizen may move about freely and settle in any part of the country, except for the limitations which the law may establish for motives of health and safety.

The Court of Cassation has come to the conclusion that this article does not deprive the police of the power to return any Italian to his place of residence if he lacks an identity card or is considered perilous to public order, public safety, or public morality. It should be borne in mind that the citizen has no legal redress against this police action.⁵²

According to Article 17 of the Constitution, citizens have the right to assemble, and it is not necessary to have the previous consent of the public authorities even for meetings open to the public. In this case the Court of Cassation has decided that Article 18 of the Law on Public Security, requiring the consent of the police and notice to the police at least three days beforehand for meetings in public places or open to the public, is abrogated by the Constitution with respect to meetings open to the public.⁵³ Article 25 of the Constitution outlaws ex post facto laws. Italy's highest court, in a case involving persons accused of "Fascist crimes," perhaps overhastily decided that this provision was in itself not retroactive, and that it only applies to future legislation.⁵⁴

Articles 36 and 40 of the Constitution protect the workers' right to a living wage and to strike. According to Article 36 the worker has a right to remuneration proportioned to the quality and quantity of his work, and in any case sufficient to assure him and his family a free and decent life. This article has been applied in many instances for the purpose of nullifying provisions in individual labor contracts at variance with the minimum pay established in collective agreements.⁵⁵ In other instances the courts have considered the article programmatic and have refused to apply it.⁵⁶

Article 40 of the Constitution reads in full: "The right to strike will be exercised in accordance with the laws that regulate it." Owing to parliamentary inactivity, no such laws have been enacted. The meaning of Article 40 seemed clear to the Naples Tribunal when it refused to hear a criminal case in which the defendants were accused of striking.⁵⁷ Five months later, however, the Tribunal of Cremona disagreed. In upholding the dismissal of striking workers, this court said, "The right to strike cannot be held to exist, since, according to Article 40 of the Constitution, it is dependent on the enactment of legislation that will distinguish between legal and illegal strikes."⁵⁸ The Court of Cassation later held that Article 40 of the Constitution is clearly preceptive, that striking is therefore a right, that qui iure suo utitur neminem laedit, and that the em-

The court went on to declare, however, that, pending legislative determination to the contrary, slowdowns or similar practices (scioperi a scacchiera, a singhiozzo, e simili) were not strikes and that employers were not restricted by Article 40 in the steps they could legally take against workers who participated in such practices.⁵⁹

Although the Constitutional Court has not been established, the High Court of Sicily has. This latter is set up in accordance with the provisions of the Sicilian Regional Constitution, and is empowered to judge the constitutionality of the laws passed by the Regional Assembly, of national laws in the light of the Sicilian Constitution, and the effectiveness of national laws within the region.⁶⁰

The High Court of Sicily has handed down at least two decisions which have done their part in increasing the present confusion in Italian constitutional law. One decision declared unconstitutional a law of the National Parliament that would have permitted alterations in the Sicilian Constitution by Parliament through ordinary legislation rather than by constitutional amendment.⁶¹ The other approved the validity of a regional law permitting issuance of bearer stock, which was in conflict with national legislation.

CONCLUSION

The Seventy-five wrote, and the Constitutional Assembly approved, a Constitution that in spite of its ambiguity and excessive length was on the whole a good piece of work. The labor of giving birth to this Constitution, however, seems to have exhausted the democratic fervor that spread over Italy at the close of the war, and there has been no serious attempt to implement its provisions.

It seems that the new Constitution was the final achievement, at least for the present, of the liberal Risorgimento spirit that united Italy in the nineteenth century, only to peter out with the disappearance from the political scene of men of the caliber of Cavour, D'Azeglio, Ricasoli, Mazzini, and Garibaldi. The enormity of Fascism and the Partisan movement reawakened this spirit, which was expressed in its highest political form by the ill-fated Action party.⁶²

As so often happens in Italian history, the spirit of renewal and reform has been overcome by the forces of tradition. In Italy these forces are ubiquitous. One should not condemn too severely Parliament, the administration, and the courts for failure to implement and enforce the Constitution when there has been little popular demand for its implementation or enforcement. Although it preserves most of the old institutions, the new Constitution implies a spiritual revolution in which the majority of the Italian people, traditionally cynics in political matters, do not believe.

In spite of the formally effective new Constitution, Italy is actually being governed under much the same laws, and people, as during Fascism. There is no longer a King; the top Fascists are out; there is no longer a death penalty; there is no legally sanctioned racial discrimination; but the inertia of Parliament and the prejudices of the bureaucracy have resisted most of the changes envisaged in the new Constitution. Otherwise so modern, so youthful and so eager to adopt the newest and best from abroad, the Italian culture has a limited concept as to the practicability of political reform.

The Italian Constitution is essentially a liberal Constitution. The De Gasperi government is essentially Roman Catholic in political orientation. It can understand and actively support such welfare measures as a revolutionary land reform, an overhauling of the tax structure, and large public works programs to improve education and transportation, but it has little feeling for liberalism. The present government, therefore, is likely in time to implement the institutional changes planned in the Constitution, but it is less likely to implement the civil liberties provisions. Only if and when the dormant liberal spirit arises again in Italy, are these provisions apt to become really effective.

THE POLITICS OF MANAGEMENT IMPROVEMENT IN THE STATES*

KARL A. BOSWORTH

University of Connecticut

In the wake of the Hoover Commission reports, a great majority of the states authorized special inquiries into the organization and operation of their executive institutions. With very few exceptions, the numerous postwar movements for state reorganization appear to have resulted in only moderate or negligible legislative acceptance of the reorganization proposals. The spectacle of such meager accomplishment from so much effort invites reflection on the politics of management improvement in the states.

Through the generous cooperation of professional colleagues about the country, data were assembled on the successes and failures of these reorganization movements, upon the initiation, organization, and scope of the surveys, and upon the methods of presenting the survey reports to the legislatures and to the public. The data cover thirty states, in twenty-four of which the state legislature has had at least one chance to consider commission recommendations. In the remaining six states¹ the reports are still in the process of preparation, or await legislative consideration. Included in the twenty-four are four states in which the study group has made some reports but continues in existence to make further reports, so that the success of the efforts in these states must be tentatively judged on the basis of legislative reception of reports so far received.

In only two of the twenty-four states—New Hampshire and New Jersey—was the legislative response pronouncedly positive. In New Hampshire, under the gubernatorial leadership of Sherman Adams, the legislature accepted all major proposals and all but one of an estimated 24 moderate-scale proposals. New Jersey is a special case in that this state was in a continual turmoil of constitutional revision and administrative reorganization efforts from 1941 into 1948, with five committees and commissions and a constitutional convention working on these problems and having among them some overlapping leadership. The commission created in 1944 to study administrative organization issued reports and recommendations serially over a period of years and received several positive legislative responses. In 1948, when the legislature met under a new constitution requiring all administrative agencies to be placed in no more than twenty departments, the legislature quickly completed a reorganization of the state's numerous agencies into fourteen statutory departments. This stage in New Jersey took place under the leadership of members of the commission created in 1944, including Governor Alfred E. Driscoll, and with the assistance of a joint legislative committee and strong, sympathetic party majorities in both houses.²

In contrast, in nine of the states³ the legislative reception has either been completely negative or so slight as to be regarded as a soundly negative response. In thirteen states,⁴ the legislative response has been ambivalent with a score—according to my rough weighted scoring method—of between twenty-nine and fifty-two per cent adoption. In about half these states with ambivalent legislative responses, the classification would have been negative on the basis of the acceptance of major proposals, and was saved from that category only by greater legislative receptivity to moderate- and minor-scale proposals.

For those of us who have participated in these reorganization efforts, the question may be: What did we do wrong? From a more detached point of view, the inquiry could run either in the direction of a critique of the content of reorganization proposals and organization theory or toward an inquiry into the politics of state administrative reorganization. Following the latter course and the view that reorganization is as much a political as a scientific process, I propose in this paper to investigate the conditions affecting the likelihood of legislative acceptance of Little Hoover Commission or similarly sourced proposals for state administrative changes.

I. GENERAL ASSUMPTIONS

It is appropriate to state certain general assumptions at this point. Legislatures tend generally to be negative toward proposals for either moderate-scale or major changes in the formal allocation of influence in their governments. The formal organization of the executive branch is, among other things, a distribution of political power and influence which reaches beyond the confines of the executive branch. There is a strong probability of alliances between legislators and officers and groups having a stake in the present organization, and there is some particular negativism toward building the influence position of the governor. These may be, in part, corollaries to a condition of general conservatism in the legislative consideration of any proposed major changes in public policy.

Certain general conditions in a setting may tend to reduce legislative negativism toward major proposals. Possibly situations of either deep despair or high optimism regarding the fate of individuals and institutions generally may reduce legislative negativism. When horizons are low because of despair, it is easy to reason that any change is unlikely to worsen conditions and may improve them (e.g., Nebraska's shift to unicameralism and other depression changes in important state policy). When horizons are wide with general optimism, the risks of any change seem lessened (e.g., the many changes in the period from the late 1890's to World War I).

If these assumptions have some validity, one may say that regardless of the immediate motivations of state reorganization activity, the excellence of surveys, the current political alignment or misalignment of the legislative houses and the governor's office, and the vigor and art of programs to interpret reorganization proposals to the public and to legislators, there is a good chance of failure in getting a positive legislative response. The existing institutions represent some sort of balance among existing forces. The usual negativism is such that a substantial share of the possible favorable conditions directly related to the reorganization effort will be needed in order to overcome what should be the expected negative legislative response. If one could time the starting of reorganization movements, probably periods of generally low personal expectations and—should they again occur in an area as large as a state—periods of high general optimism are most propitious.

II. THE MOTIVES FOR REORGANIZATION STUDIES AND PROBABLE SUCCESS

The news that "good public administration is good politics" has obviously been getting around. There seem grounds for supposing that some political leaders have sought to reap some of the benefits of this proposition without paying the price.

If a reorganization study is undertaken for motives other than improved public management, it is quite probable that little will be accomplished. Motives of "getting into the act" by imitating other states and the national government, of diverting attention from other parts of the current scenery, or of creating supposed campaign advantages, seem to have been factors in the rash of Little Hoover Commission activity. Such motives may be exhausted in the study effort, leaving little or no motivation among the influential for the consideration and adoption of proposals. Further, if the mixed-objectives situation exists in the survey commission, the recommendations may be tailored for the accomplishment of public relations motives rather than with a view to making proposals having some chance for legislative adoption. Then too, if the motives of the proponents of a survey are suspected by the populace, the popular support generally necessary for legislative action may not be forthcoming. An administration survey undertaken halfheartedly and for devious reasons may nevertheless gather support and result in significant achievement. If I interpret accurately one of our participant's questionnaire responses, something like this may have happened in one state where the survey committee "brought temporary relief to a much harassed political organization" which was being harried in regard to services and taxes. The major problem of taxation was not resolved by the committee, but several of its reorganization proposals were adopted.

A nucleus of political leaders who clearly have good faith in seeking management improvement can quite likely find strong popular support for their proposals. This is a variant expression of the Brownlow-reported Wilsonian prescription to politico-administrators to "take high ground," for who can directly oppose improved administration? That private career motives may also be aided by this approach is generally not a detracting factor.

The muckrakers taught us that finding scandalous or notorious conditions is one way to provoke reform. Though one might question some of their methods and objectives, it does seem clear that the likelihood of positive action on administrative improvement is heightened if the inadequacy of existing administration has been publicly dramatized and if the motivation for reorganization activity arises out of protests at the dramatized inadequacies. It matters little that the breakdowns may have been personal moral lapses rather than the results of faulty administrative arrangements: the "ins" and their political allies are put on the defensive. They are vulnerable to an opposing political movement to reorganize the state government, or they may be persuaded to purify themselves in the public mind through measures for administration improvement.

Probably little planned help can be expected, however, from dramatized inadequacies. Crusading newspaper publishers and sophisticated reporters of state administration are seemingly scarce about state capitols. State government news seems to rank well behind national and local government news in the value systems of many publishers. With the best of will, the inadequacies of generally honest, but bumbling, public management are about as difficult to dramatize on a broad scale as is superior, professional public management. Those hopeful of a favorable moral and emotional climate for administrative reform probably must generally rely on the happenstances of defalcations, briberies, prison breaks, accidental patient and inmate deaths, failures of state structures, the discovery of fraudulent relief clients, and similar newsworthy calamities of life in the shadow of the dome.

It appears that the economy motive is still of relatively slight force in initiating administration improvement at the state level. In most states, the systems and levels of state taxation do not inflict sharp pains upon large, politically significant groups as do the local property tax and the national income tax. Although the lush state financial picture of 1943-45 is gone, it would appear that few, if any, states are making large numbers of taxpayers cry for professional state administration, as the taxpayers of hundreds of municipalities have sought relief from rising tax rates through council-manager government. Though this present judgment is, I believe, still correct, there is every indication that the economy motive may be heightened at the state level as a result of the rapidly growing state budgets and the trend toward shifting increasing amounts of the local government burden onto the payers of the state taxes.

State taxpayer organizations are, of course, present in many of our states, but their financial and political support seems to be limited largely to those particular elements of the business, financial, and industrial community having a direct economic concern with state taxes and state policy. Although such agencies are frequently vocal and active in the camp of administrative reform, the desire of the constituency to retain friendly state policy developers and enforcers can easily neutralize the taxpayer agencies in the political battles for legislative adoption of administrative changes which increase policy uncertainties. The utilities, banks, and insurance companies know where they stand with their current state regulatory agencies. Perhaps the present situation of state taxpayer pain as a motive for administrative reform can best be described as one in which the scattershot state tax systems provide substantial motivation for the consideration of change but frequently inadequate motivation for making changes.

III. SPONSORSHIP AND REORGANIZATION SUCCESS

Hypothetically, it might be supposed that the opportunities for legislative enactment of reorganization proposals would be most favorable in a situation in which the survey is carried out under the leadership of the "outs," who thereupon become the "ins" and adopt their own recommendations before new vested interests are established in the offices to be eliminated. In 1948 Mr. Truman, with the cooperation of millions of voters, prevented the testing of this hypothesis at the national level, and, so far as has been learned, no state's reorganization activity falls exactly into this pattern.

Generally, we may agree that favorable auspices for reorganization activity would occur in the joint sponsorship of an administrative survey by a governor and legislative houses having majorities of the same political faith as the governor, with the recommendations received by the same alignment. One would also think that legislative council sponsorship would be auspicious in those states where the legislative council is well accepted as a source of legislative proposals; but in only one of the three such surveys was there significant achievement. In the South, gubernatorial sponsorship of administrative reform, with or without formal joint sponsorship by the legislature, appears to be generally auspicious. Sponsorship by a citizens' or taxpayers' organization may in some situations present feasibilities, especially if the private organization is given a temporary official connection or status by a co-sponsoring governor or legislature. The Colorado reorganization movement developed in this way. Sponsorship by the legislature through a special legislative committee or commission without formal sponsorship or participation by the governor is an alternative of rather dubious merit in most states.

In eight of the states in which there was no significant adoption of reorganization recommendations, the initiative came from the legislature in five instances. In three, the governor was the initiator or participated in the initiation. In one of these, the governor later withdrew his support, and the other two movements failed when "model" plans were rejected. In fifteen states where there was some significant adoption, governors participated in the initiation in ten, legislators were the apparent initiators in four, and a private agency sold the idea to legislators in the other one. Even more striking evidence of the significance of governors in these movements is seen in the fact that governors were active in the sponsorship of the movements in eight of the nine states adopting more than 40 per cent of the proposals, in my weighted measure.⁵

As to party divisions between the legislature and the governor, or between one house and the governor, we know that in some sharply partisan situations the division has been fatal to reorganization proposals, while in other circumstances it has not. In these latter situations, the political risks of giving the governor something for which he could take credit have apparently seemed less than the risks of killing a popularly supported measure. In Illinois, Maryland, and Massachusetts governors lacked party majorities in their legislatures, yet significant accomplishments were attained.

We have had ample evidence that legislative sponsorship of surveys does not forecast receptivity to recommendations and that governor-sponsors sometimes lose their enthusiasm for administrative reform. However, the legislators and governors are the "powers that be" in the formal government; and unless they are willing to give consideration to administrative alterations, there is no basis for any expectation of legislative action for management improvement.

With regard to political party leaders, it would seem that one must adopt the view that professional politicians, of whatever party, are likely to be no more than reluctant allies in moves for administration improvement. They have learned how to operate in the situation as it is and should generally not be expected to be enthusiastic for changes in the rules of a game in which they have perfected some art, unless such changes would remove some inconvenient obstacle.

Changes which have the tendency of making the formal government the government—the gathering into a neat hierarchy of most of the decision points—may be particularly well understood by and likewise obnoxious to the professional politicians. To the extent that the non-office-holding professional politicians have confidence in their ability to operate through the official hierarchy, this conclusion may need modification. Thus, one might find the party leaders of a regularly dominant party somewhat more receptive to proposals for administrative integration than the party leaders of a state with relatively evenly divided party contests where the chance of losing all direct influence is a risk to both parties. Likewise, in situations in which the leaders of both parties think the trend in statewide elections is toward dominance by their party, the opportunities for action may be improved. Generally, it would seem that assistance from the professional politicians can be expected only as a short-run compromise of their long-run objectives in order to support a popular issue. Governors and others with large fractions of influence can sometimes compel the professional politicians to take a passive, or even reluctantly a co-operating, role in reorganization legislation.

To round out the consideration of the political bases for reorganization activity, one must cite the almost automatic resistance to being "reorganized" of the leaders and clienteles of most administrative agencies. The Mississippi Legislative Fact-Finding Committee on Reorganization of State Government interviewed the head of each state agency, quizzing him on his reaction to creating conditions for greater efficiency by a program of consolidation. In a letter of transmittal, the Mississippi committee synthesized the uniform agency head response in the following words:

I think this is one of the very best things that has ever been done in the State of Mississippi and I have long been of the opinion that this work should have been accomplished in the past. However, my department is of a type, character and kind that cannot be consolidated with any other agency, as its duties and functions are unique, and a reduction of personnel or a transfer of any duties of this department would work a hardship and prevent certain citizens from receiving benefits to which they are entitled.

Such reactions are familiar to all of us, and one must recognize that these agreeing opponents of reorganization commonly have large resources of political influence which they have cultivated in their daily work of agency survival and growth. A clientele organization controlling the policy of the fragment of state government that specially affects it is a potent and sure source of opposition to reorganization and a ready ally in log-rolling to preserve realms undisturbed among organizations similarly situated. There are, of course, exceptions in which the case for independence is so weak as to be indefensible or where politically weak agencies become ready to seek a formal alliance with a politically strong agency. There are also the existing departments which may stand to gain by consolidations, but their enthusiasm and power potentials frequently do not match those of the agencies which have decided that "you can't reorganize us." The pluralistic character of our political organization at the state level is probably best illustrated when typical general reorganization proposals are announced.

IV. COMPOSITION AND ORGANIZATION OF COMMISSION

In considering the probable fate of commission proposals in terms of commission composition, it is probably of greatest importance that the members be persons of high general prestige and of actual political influence. It is normally not enough that they be respected, able, personally successful citizens. To express it crudely: How many votes can they swing in the legislature, and how effectively can they rally popular support? It is probably of next importance that the commission be so composed that it cannot be identified as representing any limited elements in the political spectrum of the state. The first of these considerations is expressed with a view toward the positive organization of support for the recommendations. The second, although indirectly beneficial to that end through broad representation, is expressed primarily as a defensive and cautionary concept with a view to avoiding the effective and easy labelling of the commission's effort as a minority report from a limited segment of the polity. Most other considerations with regard to commission composition are subsidiary or corollary to these two seemingly basic ones.

As to the value of legislator memberships, there are the to-be-hoped-for positive considerations of having leading legislators both committed to the recommendations and prepared to explain the proposals to their colleagues. There are, at the same time, the risks that particular legislator members will choose to entertain specific or general reservations about the recommendations and become in the inner chambers trained opponents of the proposals. There is the further risk that if an election intervenes between the formation of the commission and the legislative session which considers the report, some of the legislator members may become lame ducks and lose their influence, while others succeed to posts which remove them from the legislative arena.

The occasional lukewarmness of governors to commission proposals suggests the desirability of attempting to get commissions constructed so as to avoid this contingency. Although other means may be designed, the arrangement which allows the governor to appoint at least some of the members serves to involve him and may make some member the governor's delegate who keeps the governor informed about and possibly privately committed to the commission's work, step by step.

It is, of course, desirable that commission members be well informed about a state's executive organization and about the feasibilities of political action in the state, and it would be presumed that persons of high prestige and influence in state affairs could generally fulfill these requirements. Former governors and others who have been near the center of the complex of executive-legislative forces, if they have escaped with their reputations fairly well intact, may have particularly valuable contributions to make to a commission's endeavors and may have an authority of personal knowledge of large weight. Even some unsuccessful candidates for governor may have thought more about the executive problems of the state than most citizens. All of these considerations have been evident in our data, and in states where it is appropriate the bipartisan theme has been emphasized. There are other important personal qualities, such as the disposition and ability to work with others towards agreement in the conference situation and ability in public expositions of the commission's work. But these are minor compared with the individual prestige and influence of the members and the invulnerability of the members collectively to easy attack.

Commission size in our data varied from four to forty-one members, with each extreme having some successes in adoptions. About three-quarters of the groups had from seven to thirteen members, and size, except for the risk of unrepresentativeness in smaller commissions, has no apparent relation to success.

Certain of the commissions have had advisory committees. The success in New Hampshire where this device was used suggests the desirability of giving careful consideration to adaptations of this arrangement. An advisory group of over thirty participated with the nine commission members in subcommittees, studying and making recommendations for particular areas. This group, along with the commission members, actively organized the public campaign for the adoption of proposals.⁶ The New Hampshire story suggests that the advisory committee was not a decisive factor in their success; rather, it was one of several important contributing factors.

The Oregon interim legislative committee on state organization, which had significant successes, created an advisory committee of six university professors. Although most of us might agree that this was a wise move, I have no information regarding the role played by these professional advisers, unless it is reflected in our respondent's comment that "the staff work, while quite limited, was of high quality. . . ." The Minnesota commission divided into committees to which approximately 150 citizens were added. In this case, it appears that the added members participated in the investigatory work and the committee deliberations.

V. ORGANIZATION, SCOPE, AND METHOD OF SURVEY

In considering the scope of surveys, factors such as the terms of the authorization of the survey, the issues which precipitate the survey, the present condition of state administration, time, money, and the judgment of the commission or director may be determinative. It is with this exercise of judgment that we may be most appropriately concerned here. It has been the fashion to make the scope broad and to be expansive in the setting of objectives. Insofar as our professional craft has influenced these decisions, it is probably understandable that we have wanted to give the states the full benefit of our knowledge and wisdom. The state does not ask for our prescription every year. All too frequently, it would appear, commissions and advisers have not curbed these perfectionist inclinations; and where the authorization is broad and the time and funds are adequate, there may seem to be no alternative to the making of large plans.

Although in some states the conditions of state administration may almost compel the making of broad prescriptions, prudent judgment in the interest of securing some positive accomplishment may dictate the curbing of scope and the concentration of efforts on the areas of greatest vulnerability and the areas of greatest practicable gains. The device of being prescriptive on certain points and of being only educational on others, with suggestions of alternatives or of areas for further study, is frequently preferable. The generally limited results of the completed surveys suggest strongly that the planners of additional surveys give hard thought to the question: What are the feasible objectives of this survey?

The fact that constitutional proposals were made in all the states (with the possible exception of Delaware) in which the legislative response was negative is suggestive. Of the fifteen states in which there was significant legislative accomplishment, only six of the reorganization proposals included constitutional amendments.⁷ In most of the states where the scope of the survey was limited or the proposals have concentrated on a relatively few objectives, there has been some significant legislative acceptance of recommendations. The fact that the New Hampshire proposals were not perfectionist in any doctrinaire fashion seems relevant also.

Rather definitely to be avoided, at least on the basis of the Connecticut experience and perhaps that of other states, is the stretching of the scope beyond that understood by the authorizing body. Reorganization movements have sufficient hazards without raising the question of the legitimacy of the progeny.

In organizing general surveys, the commissions have apparently learned not to turn the whole job over to one of the national consulting firms. Monumental as the surveys and reports of these agencies have been, and useful as they may remain for various educational purposes, they have rarely been the means of producing directly positive legislative responses. Only Delaware and Virginia, among the states on which we have postwar data, turned the survey job over to one of the national consulting firms and in Delaware the accomplishment was nil. South Carolina, in a 1942-45 survey using a different national organization, had a similar experience, although a later attempt apparently using home grown talent was somewhat more successful. The outside firm arrangement creates several risks. There may not be enough participation by the commission and others for them to become parties to the conclusions and to gain an understanding of the proposals for purposes of communicating them persuasively. There is the risk that the surveyors may give too little attention to feasibilities, local values, and traditions. There is the ease of labelling the surveyors as foreign experts and thus as ignorant men so far as local conditions are concerned. With the best of will on the part of the consulting firms, continued consultation for the purpose of making explanations and modifications is likely to be difficult when the surveyors have to be pulled off new jobs and must travel back to the scene for necessarily limited periods. These observations relate solely to the use of consultant organizations for the whole survey job and not to their use on particular area surveys, as a task force, nor to their use as adviser consultants in planning surveys or reports where the survey work is done by the commission and other local agencies or consulting firms.

Although it is not a completely reliable touchstone, the engagement as survey director of a professional researcher already having some experience in the state and a favorable local reputation seems to be auspicious. Of fourteen states having some significant reorganization accomplishment for which this information is available, eleven had arrangements something like the above prescription. In several of the states with negative legislative results, the research direction seems as auspicious as in those above; but in more of them the research director had generally had less direct experience with the state government or very brief experience with the state. In one case, the director was apparently not a professional governmental researcher, although he had had state government experience.

If the governmental researcher skill group about state capitols and in nearby institutions is a superior hunting ground for survey directors, why is this so? Certainly these individuals have a head start in knowledge of state institutions. Also, they may already have in existence the nucleus of a research staff upon which to build. They are likely to continue available for the persuasion and modification stages. Finally, these individuals probably have a superior sensitivity to the feasible, the vulnerable, and the immobile and possess an authority based on the personal confidence of legislators and others in their abilities and trustworthiness. Some of them may also be able to give positive assistance in the political dynamics.

Whether task forces are used, whether specialists in functions survey the functions, whether "generalists" are used, whether the data collection on operations is heavy, moderate or slight—just so it doesn't seem to be altogether sketchy—appear to be of relatively little consequence in determining the fate of proposals for legislation on reorganization. Probably the heavy data collections are generally wasted effort, except where detailed legislation on procedures is being sought. Winners and losers have tried all methods. Perhaps the sales engineer needs to know only somewhat more about the products than do the customers. Having a few distinguished specialists may help lend authority to proposals and some of them may ease the gathering of the essential minimum of information in a field, but Connecticut, as well as other examples, illustrates the fact that having numbers of blue ribbon task force leaders does not sell the proposals. Giving attention to minor- and moderate-scale proposals seems to be somewhat controversial, some regarding it as likely to distract attention from the major proposals or otherwise disapproving of it. Most of the surveys have given attention to the lesser aspects of affairs and their successes have been largely in this area. This approach probably does distract attention, but it may also be a means of getting the legislature started in making positive responses so that the consideration of more moderate- and major-scale proposals may continue with possible favorable action. Some accomplishment, even though it be not of a first order, is a great solace to the participants and avoids the reputation of a fiasco, so that the start of future efforts may be easier. Where administration is generally good, details may be the appropriate objects of attention.

The plans in which committee consideration of reorganization is spread over a period of time, or indefinitely, with interim reports and recommendations from time to time, vary from the usual procedure. In some of these situations, as in New York, California and Massachusetts, the widespread use of legislative interim committees with vague deadlines seems to be habitual, and the prospect of results is probably closely related to the motives of the committee members and their influence in their houses, with governors possibly providing significant overtones. In Maryland, however, it is apparently the plan to complete the work before some not too distant date, but to report and recommend as studies of specific areas are completed. This approach may have the merits of concentrating attention on particular proposals and of avoiding having all the wolves howling at once. However, it risks a collapse of the movement following an adverse legislative response to the first recommendations.

VI. PRESENTATION OF SURVEY REPORT AND RECOMMENDATIONS

At least two related major considerations bear on the presentation of survey reports and recommendations. One concerns the attempts to influence the politically potent directly; the other has to do with attempts to interest the public widely so that there may be strong popular support nudging the politically potent toward action. As minimums in these two categories, one may expect the preparation of bills and appearances by the commission and its staff before legislative committees and the publication and distribution of a report with newspaper notice of the event. The varieties and variable intensities of additional efforts in the several state reorganization movements cannot all be catalogued and measured, but one can safely risk the proposition that it is the measures in addition to the minimum which generally produce the positive responses.

Measures to influence the more powerful include keeping the governor informed, interested and pleased so that he may be ready to use his influence on the legislature and the "wounded" agency heads, and the inclusion on the commission or advisory bodies of individuals with large direct political influence. In New Hampshire and Maryland explanation sessions on the proposals were held for groups of legislators about the state, presumably before the sessions at which the proposals were considered. In Utah the executives of private agencies which constitute the important lobbies about the legislature were cultivated, with efforts to neutralize them or to make them allies on the reorganization issues. In Kansas and other states some individuals representing these interests were on the commission. In states where the current configurations of political power are relatively simple, measures such as these may be adequate. In the more complex states, and anywhere in case of doubt, measures for inducing popular interest in reorganization are, of course, appropriate.

Some legislatures, in authorizing reorganization surveys, have restricted the press and public campaign opportunities by requiring a single report and directly, or in effect, extinguishing the commission upon the submission of its report. How strictly these directions are followed may depend upon the consciences and dexterities of the commission leaders. On the other hand, in Michigan there were three press releases on each of thirty reports over a two-year period, and one wonders if the human capacity for interest in reorganization may have been satiated. The device of releasing the report in chapters over a period of about two weeks has proved an effective way of getting large amounts of publicity and of producing public discussion of the report.

These considerations raise the question of secrecy for the proposals being considered and the trends of commission thought during the survey and report preparation stages. There is the quite natural tendency of commissions to attempt to minimize the pulling and hauling of contending forces about them which would be stimulated by news of commission thinking, and a like tendency to ease the altering of decisions by avoiding early tentative public commitments. There is possibly also some thought in this approach of giving the opponents less time to prepare their defenses. However, in most reorganization surveys the news gets around as to some of the commission views, and rumors and surmises based on inferences flow freely. If to these considerations are added the New Hampshire free press experience and the general tendency to involve larger numbers in the commission effort, one wonders if a nearly complete goldfish bowl policy isn't worthy of further trial. For the participants in the survey, it is undoubtedly a less comfortable, more tense situation than secret or semi-secret deliberations. The researchers should be stimulated to harder thought about the premises underlying their proposals and about the arguments and data which support these premises when their proposals and data formulations are to be opened quickly for public discussion. The injured may damage their case as much as they help it if the commission can maintain a mood of sweet reasonableness.

If a campaign for public support is to be conducted, there must be time for it as well as organization. Several of our surveys have had difficulties with their timing, getting their reports out just as legislative sessions were scheduled to meet or after sessions were well under way. All of us know some of the reasons why reports are late in appearing, but the difficulties encountered through late reporting suggest the desirability of curbing tendencies toward perfectionism and of leaving time in which public discussion of a completed report can be organized.

In the campaigns, newspapers, radio, and, in some areas, television, are media which have been used with some apparent success. Literature appropriate for mass distribution has been tried, particularly in Michigan. The device of the public forum has proved effective, particularly in New Hampshire, where over 300 such meetings were held before all sorts of organized groups. A one-day institute at the University of New Hampshire possibly helped train some of the people who participated in the forums.

The form of the commission report is, of course, significant in the campaign. If it is written and printed in a manner to stimulate wide reading, it can help. However, the generally limited success of reorganization efforts suggests the desirability of not keeping the report so simple that the substantial data relating to the proposals are omitted and are thus not readily available for later consideration of the original and alternative proposals.

In relation to the organization of mass campaigns, it seems in point to note that legislative council research directors and other similar types of persons who may direct surveys generally have disabilities for leading mass political action. For quite appropriate reasons, these researchers frequently cultivate political neutrality and the judicial habit of giving opinions only when properly requested. The university bureaus of governmental research also frequently have a cautious orientation toward political action. If these persons or agencies are leaders in the survey job, it may be appropriate for them to indicate clearly the limits within which they operate so that the commission, committee, or council can plan for and organize other leadership for a mass campaign. In contrast, survey directors who are heads of citizen or taxpayer organizations are generally in their element in the attempted organization of popular support. This has been the experience in Colorado and Michigan.

It is also to be noted that even legislative councils, which are accustomed to making legislative proposals; as well as many legislative interim committees, exercise restraint in organizing campaigns for popular support for their proposals. The courtesies among legislators, though somewhat indistinct, do not generally permit the indiscriminate building of fires under colleagues through mass political action.

The device embodied in the federal reorganization enabling acts of authorizing a chief executive to submit reorganization plans to the legislature, with the plans going into effect unless the legislature takes positive action to veto them, has had very slight use in the states. This attempt to put inertia and indecision on the side of change has been considered in a number of states but has been rejected, apparently generally in fear of adverse decisions on constitutionality. So far as has been learned, only in New Hampshire and South Carolina was legislation authorizing such plans adopted; and in New Hampshire this method was dropped when a request by Governor and Council to the Supreme Court for an opinion on the constitutionality of the procedure brought an adverse report.⁸ In South Carolina the device was provided for in their 1948 reorganization act (Act 621 of 1948), and, of nine plans submitted, three were allowed to become effective, one of the three being an alternative to one of the rejected plans.⁹

In view of the usual result of partial or complete failure in reorganization movements, it is appropriate to consider how it may be possible to keep the movements in existence so that the proposals may have additional chances for consideration. Inside of government there are the possibilities that a governor may continue to press for action, that an interim committee to give further consideration may be formed, or that a legislative council may receive such an assignment, or, if it was the survey group, may continue the studies and resubmit proposals. In several states a legislative research agency is filling such a role. In Nevada, a legislative research agency is going this year into its third legislative session with its administrative survey proposals; some of its proposals were adopted in each of the first two sessions.

Outside of government are the existing private civic agencies and groups and newly formed citizens' committees to support the reorganization proposals in imitation of the national committee. Examples of the latter are to be found in Michigan and Minnesota. Some of these agencies and groups may have difficulty avoiding the label of special pleader and others may be amateurish at times; but when their actions are coordinated with similar moves inside government, action sometimes takes place. Even when a reorganization movement has been such a failure that no one wants to nourish it back into existence, the following years and even decades may see action on particular points treated or suggested in the survey. Although our frame of reference is legislative action following surveys, it is perhaps permissible to say that these reorganization studies and proposals have values in civic education regardless of the legislative accomplishments of the movements and that they sometimes stimulate agency-sponsored administrative improvement programs. The education of legislators and the stimulation of executive offices into thought about management may produce gains which in time justify the costs and efforts of the survey.

⁹ Letter from George R. Sherrill, University of South Carolina.

VII. LEGISLATORS' VIEW OF THE PROPOSALS

Previous reference to the nature of the reorganization proposals themselves have been oblique. They will not be analyzed here in any detail. The Council of State Governments' Reorganizing State Governments, published in 1950, analyzes the recommendations of the state commissions as of that date. There seems to be little change in the later developments except perhaps for some new emphasis on legislative financial controls.

What is generally in controversy and what is in point here is the executive-management-unity-of-command-single-head-departments-centralized-auxiliary-services pattern. In the nineteen general surveys which have in some sense been completed and for which we have data on this point, fifteen embodied in their report some version of the theme of making administration responsible to executive political authority. It would thus seem that among the surveyors the executive-management-unity-of-command ideas still tend to prevail. When one looks at the adoption of major proposals in these fifteen states, he finds New Hampshire's and New Jersey's large successes and some fraction of adoption in Colorado, Nevada, Oregon, South Carolina, and Virginia, and almost no adoption of major proposals in the others. As the New Hampshire proposals tended to be very mild in their expression of the executive management concept, and as the enactment of major proposals has otherwise been quite slight, one can, I believe, assume a rather general resistance on the part of legislatures to the full acceptance of the executive management theme. There seems to be some willingness to give the governor added or enlarged tools for influencing management, but the unity-of-command-single-head administrative agency pattern seems to have limited attractiveness to the legislatures, perhaps less than in the 'twenties and 'thirties.

If these inferences are correct, we may, insofar as the content of proposals has influenced legislative reactions, have a situation of conflicting values and viewpoints. There is no way in logic to reconcile differences resulting from affinities for conflicting premises, and there is no point in attempting it. If some legislators want to think of reorganization proposals in terms of how they affect employees Mabel and Joe, the sportsmen and the dentists, and of how the likely officeholders they know about fit the gubernatorial and department head thrones prepared for them in a reorganization plan, these ways of thinking are to be expected. If other legislators, some governors, citizens, and students of state administration want to think in terms of countering the centrifugal tendencies toward governments for every group and region within a loose holding corporation state government and of creating conditions which are more favorable for the resolution of conflicts, for the coordination of those activities which may with economy be coordinated, for the location of responsibility for executive development and execution of policy, and for the development, preservation, and communication of the arts of professional management and professional performance of functions, these ways of thinking are also to be expected. Whatever one thinks of these varied expectations, there is for the professional participant in movements for administrative change no basis for being doctrinaire. There is rather an opportunity to try to find the accommodations to these various values which can be arrived at currently in enactable measures. What is arrived at in reorganization proposals may not be neat in pattern and may look both toward integration and particularism, but if the conditions for developing professional administration are bettered, that is much to be preferred than having copies of a rejected "model" report.

Certainly to be avoided is the highly vulnerable position of asserting that economy or better services will flow from the enactment of reorganization plans. Any legislator knows that the occupants of the governor's and commissioners' chairs may have as their better talents and primary interests other matters than the general management of large enterprises. What they may not know and can perhaps be taught by modest demonstrations is that better services and economies can be attained by creating the conditions in which many people in the administration search regularly and broadly for optimum methods and arrangements for performing public tasks.

THE HOOVER COMMISSION'S PERSONNEL RECOMMENDATIONS—A PROGRESS REPORT

HAROLD H. LEICH*

U. S. Civil Service Commission

The Hoover Commission's personnel management report was published on February 9, 1949, early in the first session of the 81st Congress.¹ Four sessions of the Congress have had an opportunity to act on the report, and the executive branch has had four years to take advantage of those recommendations that could be adopted by administrative action. This seems to be an appropriate time, therefore, to review the record of progress in both legislative and executive branches, in order to learn the extent to which these far-reaching recommendations for improvement of federal personnel management have been adopted.

Soon after publication of the report, intensive study and discussions began within the executive branch. The Civil Service Commission sent a preliminary memorandum of its views to the President on March 23, 1949, with a transmittal letter referring to the report as a "constructive document," and agreeing with the objective of establishing a civilian career service.² The Federal Personnel Council, composed of personnel directors of federal agencies and representatives of the Civil Service Commission and the Bureau of the Budget, made a detailed study of the report and submitted a number of comments to the Civil Service Commission.³ The Council endorsed most of the recommendations and suggested perfecting amendments to others, particularly those dealing with performance ratings and reductions in force.

Comprehensive bills embodying all personnel recommendations of the Hoover Commission that required legislation were introduced in June, 1949 by Senator McCarthy (S. 2111) and Representative Clare E. Hoffman (H. R. 5181) under the title "Federal Personnel Policy Act of 1949." Thus began intensive legislative activity in the form of hearings, committee reports, and revised bills that continued throughout the 81st and 82nd Congresses. Detailed consideration of the complex sequence of events in the executive and legislative branches is beyond the scope of this paper, but major developments are discussed under the subject headings below, which are arranged in the general order of the Hoover Commission recommendations.

Civil Service Commission* (Washington, 1949) likewise gives the Commission's position on the major Hoover Commission recommendations (pp. 2-10).

Staff Functions of the Civil Service Commission. The Hoover Commission's first and fundamental recommendation was that the Civil Service Commission place primary emphasis on staff functions, rather than upon "processing a multitude of personnel transactions." While the Civil Service Commission still performs many operating functions, the past ten years show a trend in the direction advocated. This trend began early in World War II, when the Commission delegated authority to agency heads to take final action on such matters as employee reassignments and promotions. At the end of World War II a definite effort was made to carry over the benefits of decentralized administration into peacetime operations.⁴ Executive Order No. 9830 of February 24, 1947, enunciated the principle of decentralized personnel management in the following terms:

Personnel management is a primary responsibility of all who plan, direct, or supervise the work of Federal employees. . . . The Commission shall . . . delegate to the agencies its authority to act in personnel matters in accordance with standards issued by the Commission.

The Hoover Commission's recommendation for expanding the Commission's staff functions has unquestionably strengthened the movement toward decentralized personnel operations. In the legislative field, two important acts of Congress reflect the Hoover Commission's influence: the Classification Act of 1949 (63 Stat. 954) and the Performance Rating Act of 1950 (64 Stat. 1098), both of which recognized the Civil Service Commission as a standard-setting rather than an operating agency. In the executive branch some progress in this direction has been made by expanding the program for boards of civil-service examiners, by setting standards governing agency promotion programs, and by establishing guidelines for agency personnel programs. The Korean emergency stimulated a new wave of delegation from the Commission to the agencies.⁵

The Commission's Inspection Service, established in 1946 to check on delegated authorities under the decentralization program, has broadened its scope to emphasize a positive program of assistance to agency personnel offices. As a result of periodic visits by inspectors to review agency personnel operations, both in Washington and the field, this service has accumulated a fund of information on agency personnel management. It receives frequent requests from personnel officers for advice on such matters as installation of new promotion programs and selection of materials for training courses.

On the other hand, the Civil Service Commission still operates a centralized system of conducting record checks and inquiries regarding the loyalty of applicants for federal employment, of adjudicating retirement claims, and of maintaining service records of all federal employees. The Commission's present dichotomous role is recognized in its current internal instructions:

⁵ 68th Annual Report of the U. S. Civil Service Commission (Washington, 1951).

The U. S. Civil Service Commission has two very definite, yet very different roles in the field of Federal personnel administration.

One is to serve as a management arm of the President, and in this capacity to make top policy decisions and develop relationships between the agencies, the Commission, and the Bureau of the Budget which will provide the leadership in Federal personnel administration that the President would provide if he had the time to do so.

The other role is that of an operating agency charged with the responsibility of administering certain Federal personnel programs as required by various acts of the Congress.

While the line between staff and operating functions may shift within the Commission's total program, there probably will always be a certain number of personnel services which must be performed centrally, either in the Commission or elsewhere.⁶

Reorganization of the Civil Service Commission. The Hoover Commission recommended that the Civil Service Commission be reorganized to vest in its chairman full responsibility for the administrative direction of its work. Reorganization Plan No. 5 of 1949 promptly carried out the principal features of this recommendation.⁷ Under this plan the title of the Commission's head official was changed from "president" to "chairman," and he was given full responsibility for administrative direction of the Commission's day-to-day operations, with a few exceptions such as appeals and appointments to key staff positions. The other two Commissioners and the Chairman serve together as a policy-making, appellate, and investigating body for general supervision of the merit system. The new organization represents a compromise between the previous plan of a commission of three members, each with equal administrative responsibility, and the controversial recommendation of the President's Committee on Administrative Management in 1937 for a single civil-service administrator assisted by a civil service board of prominent citizens.⁸ Three years of operation under the plan seem to indicate that it is serving its dual purpose of speeding up internal operations and freeing the other two Commissioners to concentrate on appeals and improvements in policy. Nevertheless it is already apparent that the compromise will not satisfy the proponents of the single-administrator type of personnel authority.⁹

Reorganization Plan No. 5 did not adopt the Hoover Commission's proposal that the Civil Service Chairman should serve "in the President's Office in a coordinate capacity with such officials as the Director of the Office of the Budget." This issue was revived in the 82nd Congress, when Senator McClellan and 13 colleagues introduced the "General Executive Management Bill" (S. 1134), incorporating a number of the Hoover Commission proposals. Chairman Ramspeck indicated his disagreement, stating that "The position of Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, I can assure you, is a full-time job," and that the responsibility of advising the President on the diverse personnel systems of the executive branch constituted a separate full-time job. He felt that the President's liaison officer for personnel management effectively fulfilled the latter need.¹⁰

⁶ Commissioner James K. Pollock, in his vigorous dissent to the personnel management report, recommended that the residual operating activities of the Civil Service Commission, such as retirement, be transferred to an Office of General Services (Personnel Management, p. 52).

Role of the Personnel Director. The Hoover Commission recommended that personnel directors be made members of the "top management staffs" of all departments and agencies and that they be consulted on personnel matters whenever important management policies are being developed.

Through the influence of the President's Committee on Administrative Management, the basic transition between the former chief clerk system and a system of personnel directors had been completed some years before the Hoover Commission study.¹¹ Executive Order No. 7916 of June 24, 1938, which resulted directly from the Committee's work, required each agency to appoint a "director of personnel supervision and management," a rather unfortunate title for a staff official. This order was superseded by Executive Order No. 9830, which required the head of each agency to "... designate a director of personnel or other similar responsible official. . . ." The latter order attempted to establish the personnel director's influence in the following terms: "Such director or other official shall represent the head of the agency in personnel matters, subject to his instructions."

Even though most federal departments and agencies employed personnel directors in 1949, the Hoover Commission recognized that in many cases their activity was limited to the formal paper work of personnel management. The influence of its recommendation is difficult to assess. Some indication of the place of federal personnel directors in top management councils is afforded by the grade classification of their positions. At the time of the Hoover Commission study, the typical grade of the personnel director in a large organization was CAF-15. Under the new Classification Act, three new grades have been added to the former grade ceiling of CAF-15. Four directors of personnel have achieved the lowest rung in these so-called "super grades," the top personnel positions in the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, Treasury, and Air Force having been placed in grade GS-16. It could be argued that in relative rank the personnel directors have lost ground since 1949, since they are now in the third or fourth career rank instead of the first. This classification criterion indicates that much greater progress was made in increasing the stature of personnel officials between 1937 and 1948 than in the briefer period since then.

The President's Committee on Administrative Management found that in 1937 top personnel officials were usually classified in grades CAF-11 or 12, with a few in CAF-13 or 14.¹²

Possibly a more valid method of evaluating the personnel director's role would be to determine the extent to which he can actually speak for his agency head. This might be done by comparing positions taken by the personnel directors at the Federal Personnel Council with official positions on the same issues later taken by their superiors. It may be significant that the Bureau of the Budget still requests written reports from agency heads when clearing drafts of personnel legislation or executive orders, instead of relying exclusively on the Council's views. In any event, considerably more progress must be made before federal personnel directors can enjoy the prestige of their colleagues in private life who have achieved such titles as "vice president in charge of industrial relations."¹³

A related recommendation of the Hoover Commission was that personnel officials serve in an advisory capacity only, with most personnel activities being carried on by operating officials. Executive Order No. 9830 had aimed at this objective in the following words:

Authority for the conduct of personnel matters within each agency should be delegated to the extent compatible with provisions of law and with economical and efficient administration to those officials responsible for planning, directing, and supervising the work of others.

The military departments have taken the leadership in delegating authority for civilian personnel matters from headquarters to local commanding officers. The Post Office Department has made considerable progress in the last year or two in delegating final appointing authority to postmasters of several hundred of its largest offices. Some agencies, on the other hand, still operate on a fairly centralized basis, in that appointments and removals even in the lower grades must be referred to Washington headquarters for approval. For several years the Civil Service Commission has urged agencies to delegate personnel authority.¹⁴

Standards for Agency Personnel Office Operations. The Hoover Commission urged that the Civil Service Commission develop standards for the operation of agency personnel offices, so that each agency head could tell whether his personnel force was overstaffed. This recommendation reflected a feeling that personnel administration in the federal service had become overdeveloped.

Encouraging progress in making this recommendation effective can be reported. On January 17, 1950, President Truman issued a statement in which he gave "approval and strong support" to a recommendation of his Committee on Management Improvement that "To improve the operation of agency personnel offices, the Commission will define the nature and scope of agency personnel programs and develop improved operating practices and standards." This was the first clear-cut authorization to the Commission to proceed in this field. Under the directive, the Commission issued a handbook entitled Basic Personnel Records and Files System for Federal Agencies (Handbook S812, October 12, 1950). It was prepared by the Bureau of the Budget and the Commission with agency cooperation and prescribes an integrated system for maintaining personnel records. By standardizing record-keeping, the handbook frees resources for more important phases of the personnel program. The Commission has also issued a new chapter in the Federal Personnel Manual entitled "Guides for Determining the Nature and Scope of Agency Personnel Programs." These guides, written with the help of the Federal Personnel Council, list the minimum acceptable standards for an agency personnel program. They include standards under such headings as "position classification," "promotion," "employee performance evaluation," and "employee development." The guides provide a check-list for agencies and are used by the Commission's inspectors in determining whether an agency has a satisfactory personnel program. They represent a new development in civil-service administration, since state and local civil-service systems do not generally prescribe standards for departmental personnel administration. The guides are now being revised and strengthened on the basis of a year's experience in their use.

Standards for determining whether a personnel office is properly staffed were developed by the Bureau of the Budget in 1948 in response to a request from the House Appropriations Committee. This emphasis on staffing standards reflected the findings of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.¹⁵ The Committee discovered that personnel workers had tripled in number since 1940, while the total size of the service had only doubled. Some departments had ratios as high as 1 personnel worker to every 50 employees. As a general yardstick, the Bureau of the Budget set a ratio of 1 personnel worker to 103 employees but exceptions were allowed for agencies having unusual conditions such as large seasonal employment or abnormal turnover rates. The Congress did not consider this ratio sufficiently stringent, and established a statutory ratio of 1 to 115 for all independent agencies by a rider to the 1950 Independent Offices Appropriation Act (63 Stat. 631). This ratio has since been tightened to 1 to 135 by the 1953 act (P.L. 455). The Department of Labor and the Federal Security Agency operate under a statutory ratio of 1 to 105. Most other departments and agencies have no statutory ratio but are subject to the original ratio administratively applied by the Bureau of the Budget.

Emphasis on personnel ratios has had a mixed effect. While some agencies have shifted personnel work to operating officials, others have re-centralized the work from subordinate levels back to the headquarters personnel office. Many personnel officials state that ratios have hampered constructive developmental work while regulatory "paper work" has necessarily continued. Unfortunately the numerical ratio does not measure the quality of the personnel services rendered.¹⁶

A satisfactory solution to the personnel office staffing problem has not yet been achieved. Variations from agency to agency in personnel operations are so wide that development of realistic staffing standards is extremely difficult. Strengthening of the Commission's program guides would seem to form an appropriate first step, since a personnel program must be defined before its staffing requirements can be determined. As a further step the Budget Bureau has requested the Commission to undertake a study of the problem.

Responsibility for Recruitment and Examining. This is at the heart of the controversy between the Hoover Commission proponents and those favoring the status quo. The essence of the disagreement lies in the Hoover Commission's recommendation that "primary responsibility" for recruiting and examining federal employees be transferred from the Civil Service Commission, where it has been since 1883, to the departments and agencies. In its letter to the President of March 23, 1949, the Civil Service Commission opposed the proposal. The major veterans' organizations and employee unions also vigorously opposed this recommendation. Some spokesmen expressed the belief that the Commission's postwar decentralization plan had already gone too far and that the trend should move back towards a centralized plan of operations.

No congressional action was taken on the Federal Personnel Policy bills because of the opposition of veterans' groups. In the spring of 1950 staff members of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, the Bureau of the Budget, and the Civil Service Commission drafted a revised bill with the hope of meeting the principal objections raised to S. 2111. This bill was limited to matters of recruitment, examination, transfer, and procedural standards. The key provision lay in section 3 (a):

It shall be the duty and responsibility of the Commission to maintain and protect a system of recruitment, examination, certification, and selection of persons for competitive civil-service positions in the departments which will result in open competition and selection on merit.

This draft was introduced as the Federal Personnel Recruitment Act (H. R. 8925) by Chairman Murray of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Senator Frear introduced a companion bill, S. 3830, and hearings were conducted by both House and Senate Committees. The Civil Service Commission endorsed the bills, stating that they represented a merging of the best features of the Hoover Commission proposals with existing civil-service procedures. Chairman Mitchell's letter of June 27, 1950 to Chairman Murray pointed out that the bill contained five specific safeguards for the merit system.¹⁷

¹⁷ H. Rept. No. 2698, 81st Cong., 2nd Sess., 1950.

Then began a round of amendments. Arthur S. Flemming, speaking for the Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report and drawing on his experience both as a former Civil Service Commissioner and as a member of the Hoover Commission, proposed that sec. 3 (a) be changed to read "It shall be the duty and responsibility of the Commission and the departments to maintain . . ." [italics added] thus substituting co-equal authority for the sole responsibility of the Commission. The Commission countered with an amendment stating that "It shall be the duty and responsibility of the Commission, with the assistance of each department, to maintain . . ." [italics added] and this version was adopted in the bill reported out by the House Committee on July 20, 1950. No further action was taken in the 81st Congress.

The issue was revived before the Senate Committee in the first session of the 82nd Congress, when the version proposed by the Citizens Committee was included in S. 1135, a modification of the Federal Personnel Recruitment bill. A final solution was then agreed to by the Commission and the Citizens Committee: "It shall be the duty and responsibility of the Commission and the departments under regulations of the Commission to maintain . . ." [italics added]. As the Senate report stated, this version "makes it clear that the Civil Service Commission will continue to have primary responsibility for protection of the merit system."¹⁸ The bill passed the Senate in the hectic final week of the first session; its passage was generally considered a "fluke."

Hearings on S. 1135 were conducted by the House Committee during the second session of the 82nd Congress. As indicated below, the major veteran and employee groups consistently opposed the measure. The House Committee ordered a print of the bill striking out sections 8 and 9, which contained the provisions on the "rule of 5" and category ratings, but the bill died in committee at the end of the 82nd Congress.

Space does not permit discussion of other skirmishes in the battle of amendments. Attention is called, however, to one significant feature proposed by the Commission, agreed to by the Citizens Committee, and incorporated as section 6 (d) in the version of S. 1135 passed by the Senate. This provided that whenever the Commission performed additional examining work as a result of withdrawing examining authority from an agency found to be violating standards, the Commission would be reimbursed from the funds of the agency concerned upon approval of the Bureau of the Budget. The final version of S. 1135, therefore, left no doubt that the Commission would still be "in the driver's seat" and represented a considerable change from the original Hoover Commission position.

Although no change has occurred in basic legislation, further decentralization of examining operations to boards of examiners has continued under the spur of the Korean emergency. The number of boards has increased to some 825 and they can hold examinations for many additional types of jobs. Early in 1951 the Commission reported that it had delegated a greater degree of authority, on a national scale, to boards of examiners than in World War II.¹⁹ The board system proved so effective in maintaining the competitive system of examinations in the field service under emergency conditions that in November, 1951 the Commission urged agencies to establish boards of examiners at agency headquarters in Washington. Thus, while opposing the transfer of primary examining authority to the agencies, the Commission sponsored the actual devolvement of examining work to agency officials, who serve as part-time members of examining boards under the Commission's supervision. The present plan is not too different from that contemplated by S. 1135 so far as the sharing of examining work between the Commission and the agencies is concerned. The essential difference lies in the intangible element of responsibility. Today, with the Commission bearing the major responsibility, an operating official may mistakenly feel that it is legitimate for him to seek loopholes in the civil service system. Under S. 1135 the agency head as well as the Commission would have a direct legal responsibility for upholding the merit system.

Category Ratings. Building on the experience of the TVA, the Hoover Commission recommended a new system for grading and selecting competitors in civil-service examinations. Instead of a numerical scale with the traditional "rule of three," a scale of categories such as "outstanding," "well qualified," "qualified," and "unqualified" would be used. Appointing officers would be given free choice within the highest category, except that veterans would be considered ahead of non-veterans.

This recommendation also has had a stormy history. Veterans' groups and employee unions consistently and bitterly opposed it. Opposition has centered on the very latitude that the Hoover Commission sought. The adverse arguments were succinctly stated by Luther C. Steward, long-time president of the National Federation of Federal Employees:

I would say that it would be a very obtuse operating official who could not with the aid of someone at his right hand versed in personnel administration procedure run a coach and four through your category certification and appoint just exactly what individual he pleased.²⁰

In its letter to the President, the Civil Service Commission conceded that agency officials needed greater latitude in selection for high-level positions and possibly some other positions, but objected to the use of category rating for all positions. It made a counterproposal that the rule of three be continued for most routine lower grade jobs, with a rule of five for more complex jobs in the middle grades, and category ratings for high level positions and any other positions prescribed by the Commission.²¹

S. 2111 (81st Congress—1st session) presented the category method in its undiluted form: that is, applicable to all positions. The history of later bills is the progressive weakening of the principle under the attack of its opponents.

H. R. 8925 (81st Congress—2nd session) embodied the Commission's idea of a three-step plan: rule of three, rule of five, and category rating. The bill gave the Commission full authority to prescribe the jobs for which category rating would be used, and the Commission's favorable report on the bill made it clear that due caution would be used by limiting the method at first to a "relatively few specialized positions." Significantly, the postal field service was singled out in the bill as being confined to the rule of three. The Citizens Committee proposed an amendment which would require the use of category ratings for "professional, administrative, and scientific positions of a high level," except in unusual circumstances. The Commission agreed to this amendment, and it was embodied in the bill as reported out by the House Committee. When S. 1135 was introduced in the 82nd Congress, it contained the same wording. In the meantime, however, discussions had taken place between representatives of the Commission and veterans groups. With the hope of enlisting veteran support, the Commission proposed that category rating not be applied to administrative positions. Therefore, in the bill as finally passed by the Senate, category rating was authorized only for "such scientific and professional positions as the Commission may designate."

Failure to obtain legislative authority for category rating, even in diluted form, may be attributed chiefly to a suspicion on the part of veterans' representatives that the proposal was a device to by-pass veteran preference provisions. Disputes arose as to whether a veteran obtained a greater or lesser amount of preference under category rating than under traditional numerical rating with its addition of 5 and 10 points for veteran preference. The problem cannot be solved arithmetically; the two methods are wholly different and defy easy comparisons.

In the writer's opinion, there is no reason to despair of good selection practices in the absence of category ratings. After all, the British civil-service has built a rather respectable reputation on the foundation of the rule of one. Better examining devices, coupled with greater participation by administrators in the examining process, may provide one answer to this problem pending a more fundamental legislative solution.²²

Veterans' Placement System. The Hoover Commission recommended establishment of a nation-wide recruiting system to place veterans in federal positions through selected government agencies. While general agreement was expressed with the objectives of this recommendation, it found little specific support in the legislative or executive branch or even among the veterans' groups, despite the fact, as indicated by Lewis B. Sims, that the Hoover Commission staff discussed it with representatives of the major veterans' organizations and the Commission.²³

S. 2111 contained a section authorizing "Veterans' Civil Service Counseling and Placement Facilities." This section was not included in H. R. 8925, but reappeared in the original version of S. 1135. It was later stricken by the Senate Committee.²⁴ One reason why no action has been taken to date may be that 60% of all male federal employees are now entitled to veteran preference, a rather conclusive indication that the existing appointment system does place veterans in federal jobs.

Recruitment of Junior Personnel. While the Hoover Commission recognized that some progress had been made in recruiting competent juniors, it recommended that far more emphasis be placed on attracting first-rate young men and women into professional, scientific, technical, and administrative posts.

Its concern on this score was understandable. Before World War II the Junior Civil Service Examiner examination, initiated by Leonard D. White, and later the Junior Professional Assistant examinations, had achieved some degree of success. Emergency hiring practices in World War II, however, meant that many of the young persons recruited during wartime had to be released in postwar reductions. Furthermore, young men were not generally available to compete during the war expansion. The postwar examinations for junior personnel failed to maintain the high reputation of their predecessors. In the administrative field a special examination was conducted under the title of Junior Administrative Technician. The examining plan provided only for a general abilities test, with no oral examination. Though thousands passed the examination, the agencies formed a poor opinion of the quality of the candidates and few appointments resulted.

A drastic change in this examining plan was underway at the time of the Hoover Commission study. In 1948 the Committee on Administrative Personnel, an advisory group to the Civil Service Commission under the chairmanship of Emery E. Olson, had recommended that a new examination be tried with the title of Junior Management Assistant. The Committee urged that the written test measure knowledge and ability in the field of administration and that oral examinations be required. Under the guidance of an interagency committee of expert examiners, the JMA was initiated in the fall of 1948 and the first appointees entered on duty in June, 1949. The examination has been repeated annually with a growing degree of success. Typically some ten or twelve thousand persons have taken the written test, of whom only about five hundred have passed. Almost every successful candidate has had one or more offers of permanent federal employment, usually in an agency having an administrative internship program.²⁵ The success of the JMA examination owes much to the fact that agency users of the register have a voice in the examining plan.

A never-ending discussion goes on regarding the academic requirements for the JMA examination. Originally designed to admit persons with specific training in business and public administration and political science, the examination was changed in 1951 to admit persons trained in any of the social sciences. The answer to the problem would seem to be in long-range research regarding the relative success in federal work of recruits with differing backgrounds.²⁶

The internship programs now underway in a number of federal agencies represent a most encouraging development.²⁷ They insure that new recruits receive a careful introduction to their work and are not forgotten in some obscure cubbyhole. Thus these programs help to avoid the danger cited by Commissioner James K. Pollock that "Public servants conditioned to be clerks during their whole formative experience may be expected to remain clerks even when great responsibilities are thrust upon them."²⁸ The internships of the National Institute of Public Affairs led the way for the current federal programs. The fields of engineering and public health as well as administrative work are now included. Although both the JMA and the internship programs began before the Hoover Commission's report was published, the report unquestionably furnished an impetus and was influential in winning acceptance for the programs from top federal officials.

A Comprehensive Pay Policy for the Executive Branch. The Hoover Commission proposed comprehensive pay legislation governing the entire executive branch under which the Congress would limit its participation in pay matters to setting maximum and minimum pay rates. Subject to the President's approval, the Civil Service Commission would set detailed pay scales within these legal limits and would issue standards for agency job evaluation plans. Actual pay-fixing for individual employees would be done by the agencies under the Commission's standards.

These pay recommendations were endorsed by the Civil Service Commission, which pointed out that:

At present a variety of different and in many instances conflicting pay policies and authorities exist which result in inequality and inconsistency of employee treatment. The organization for the control of pay administration is incomplete and cumbersome. No single law prescribes and no single agency has the responsibility and authority to establish, develop and coordinate government-wide policies and standards governing pay administration.²⁹

The Federal Personnel Council also endorsed the recommendations. They were incorporated in the Federal Personnel Policy bills of the 81st Congress (section

4 of S. 2111 and H. R. 5181). The pay issues, however, received relatively little attention in the furore over recruitment policies. The pay section was not carried over into the various personnel bills of the 82nd Congress.

The chaotic federal pay structure was improved somewhat by the Classification Act of 1949, which brought within its coverage customs and immigration inspectors, previously paid under different statutes, the employees of certain agencies whose pay had been established by administrative action of the agencies concerned, and some positions previously covered by specific law. Today, however, the two-and-a-half million federal employees are still paid under many different systems and a comprehensive pay policy remains to be achieved.

The Hoover Commission's influence did help to bring about delegation of pay-fixing authority to agencies for the single largest group of federal positions governed by one pay statute: the Classification Act group. The Classification Act of 1923, covering most "white collar" federal employees outside of the Postal Field Service and the Foreign Service, set detailed salary scales on a nation-wide basis. The law required a highly centralized type of operation for covered positions in headquarters offices in Washington, since prior approval of the Civil Service Commission had to be obtained before a new position could be classified. (In the field service, agency heads had authority to classify positions subject to the pay schedules in the act.) For several years the Commission had recommended that the act be re-written to grant classification authority to agencies for all covered positions.³⁰ With the added backing of the Hoover Commission report, a completely revised law was enacted as the Classification Act of 1949. The new act represents the "standards-post audit" approach to the problem of achieving delegated action in a widespread organization under central guidance and control. The Commission publishes detailed standards describing the various series and classes of positions under the act. Each agency head is responsible for applying these standards in classifying the covered positions in his own agency (except those in the three highest grades). From time to time the Commission's representatives review the classification actions taken in the agencies. The Commission has full power to act on appeals, to correct improper classifications, and even to withdraw classification authority in whole or in part if the findings justify such action.

Thus for more than one million positions under the Classification Act, the Hoover Commission's recommendation for delegation of authority from the Civil Service Commission to agency heads is now in operation, although the various pay steps between the maximum and the minimum are still prescribed by law. The centralized postal pay system has not been affected, nor, at the opposite extreme, has the individual authority of agency heads to fix "blue collar" wage rates without centralized coordination or control.

National Pay Rates versus Locality or Industry Differentials. With regard to postal, clerical, subprofessional, and "blue collar" workers, the Hoover Commission recommended that pay be fixed according to differentials existing in private business for different localities, areas, or industries. This recommendation recognized the substantial differences between industrial pay levels in most rural areas and in large metropolitan centers. Federal blue collar workers are now paid according to local prevailing rates as determined by each agency head, usually on the basis of data collected by agency wage boards from private employers in the area. The other groups of federal workers mentioned by the Hoover Commission are paid under nation-wide scales set by Congress.

The Civil Service Commission agreed with the objectives of this recommendation but pointed to a number of administrative difficulties. No coordinating machinery existed for setting locality pay rates for the 600,000 federal blue collar workers on the rolls in 1949. The Commission was reluctant to see the principle extended to some 1,200,000 additional workers before the existing problem was solved. In addition, the relationship of locality rates in the lower grades to national rates in the middle and higher grades would cause difficulties. In a small town there might be a large gap between the highest locality rate and the lowest national rate, while in metropolitan areas the locality rates might overlap the national rates. "It appears to us," the Commission stated, "that this question has not been thoroughly thought through."²¹ To help overcome these difficulties in high-pay areas, the Commission suggested that it be authorized to set entrance pay levels for Classification Act grades at one of the steps above the minimum whenever necessary to obtain a sufficient number of qualified employees in the area. An annual review would be made to see whether the increased rate should be maintained or adjusted. The Commission recommended this plan as a part of the Classification Act of 1949 but the proposal failed of adoption. It is still carried as an item in the Commission's legislative program.²²

Provisions in line with the Hoover Commission proposals were incorporated in the Federal Personnel Policy bills of the 81st Congress, but were not carried forward into the personnel bills of the next Congress. The Commission, however, has recommended legislation to remove some 70,000 positions from the Classification Act and place them under agency wage-board authority. These are the blue-collar positions in the present crafts, protective, and custodial schedule, such as maintenance workers on government projects.²³ In the meantime, some administrative progress is being made in coordinating the wage boards which fix the pay of federal blue-collar workers, who now number more than 850,000 under the defense expansion. The Department of Defense is coordinating the periodic wage surveys of the three military departments so that a joint survey will be made in each labor market and private employers will not be asked to provide data three times. While this represents progress, it does not answer the basic problem, since the actual wage rates are not yet coordinated or made consistent for all three military departments.

Increased Salaries for Higher Grade Positions. Pointing out that pay rates in the lower grades had increased more proportionately than rates in the higher grades, the Hoover Commission urged that the salary ceiling of $10,330 for career employees be raised. It also recommended increases for legislative and judicial salaries and for presidential appointees. This recommendation found ready acceptance, and quick action followed for executive branch positions. Public Law 359, 81st Congress, fixed an increased salary schedule for 229 top positions in the executive branch, such as heads of departments and agencies and their assistants and members of boards and commissions. Previous annual salaries for these appointive posts, ranging from $10,000 to $15,000, were superseded by new rates ranging from $14,000 to $22,500. Increases for the top career posts were provided by the Classification Act of 1949. Three new "supergrades" were added to the previous ceiling of CAF-15 ($10,330), and the number of positions in the new grades was prescribed by law. Three hundred were allowed in GS-16 (now $12,000 to $12,800), 75 in GS-17 (now $13,000 to $13,800), and 25 in GS-18 (now $14,800). Positions can be classified in grades GS-16 and 17 only by action of the Civil Service Commission, and in GS-18 only after approval of the President upon recommendation of the Commission. The defense expansion caused an inevitable increase in the number of supergrade positions. Various laws granted agencies additional positions in these grades outside of the quota of 400, until today 934 in all are authorized. The Commission has recommended that the number of supergrade positions be increased through elimination of the existing quota or through a broad authorization of additional positions.

The Hoover Commission mentioned no figure as a desirable maximum salary for career positions, but the personnel task force report recommended $15,000 as the top career salary. The present $14,800 career maximum (GS-18) does not fall too far below this amount, although lower living costs in 1949 made the $15,000 figure more attractive than it is today. There is still a serious gap between the percentage increases in the higher grades and those in the lower grades, as may be seen by comparing entrance salaries. The present GS-1 salary of $2500 is 98 per cent greater than the prewar figure of $1260 for CAF-1. Before the war CAF-15 carried a salary of $8,000, which has now been increased only 35 per cent to the present $10,800 salary for GS-15. If, however, CAF-15 is compared with GS-18, now the top grade, the increase represents 85 per cent.

Rewards to Administrators Who Reduce Payrolls. As part of its proposed new pay system, the Hoover Commission recommended that administrators and supervisors be rewarded for reducing the payroll. This recommendation was readily agreed to and was incorporated in the Classification Act of 1949 as Title X. Under regulations of the Budget Bureau, each department makes periodic reviews of its various activities to determine efficiency of operations and to identify supervisors and employees whose efforts have caused their units to be outstanding. Cash awards are authorized for such supervisors and employees through an efficiency-awards committee in each department. This authorization is in addition to the salary step-increases for superior accomplishment under Title VII of the Classification Act and the cash awards under P. L. 600, 79th Congress (60 Stat. 806). Here we have too much of a good thing. An administrator is confronted by three methods for rewarding efficiency, and administrative responsibility for the programs is divided between the Bureau and the Commission. The Subcommittee on Federal Manpower Policies of the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service has recommended a new bill merging the three awards authorizations into one statute, with the Commission responsible for issuing regulations and encouraging agencies to carry out effective programs.³⁴

Promotion Programs. Dissatisfied with the lack of systematic promotion programs in the federal service, the Hoover Commission recommended that the President require all agencies to work out promotion programs.

In 1938, in an attempt to solve this problem, Executive Order 7916 required agencies to establish promotion systems, and the Civil Service Commission urged the use of competitive promotion examinations. A start had barely been made when the defense program prior to World War II ended the experiment. Nevertheless some agencies continued their efforts to develop systematic promotion plans. A few held occasional written promotion tests, announced to all employees. Others posted vacancy notices on bulletin boards and invited qualified employees to apply at the personnel office. In other cases the qualifications of employees were coded on punch cards so that the names of all having the required qualifications could be quickly ascertained by placement officers. In all too many agencies, however, promotions were made within narrow units, or on the basis of personal acquaintance or the chance spotting of a likely prospect.

The Hoover Commission recommendation served to expedite a study which was then underway in the Civil Service Commission. A plan was discussed with employee unions and the Federal Personnel Council and was issued in May, 1950. Each agency in the competitive service was required to establish a systematic promotion program after consultation with employees. Seven principles were established by the Commission, but no attempt was made to prescribe the details of screening methods or selection procedures. The chief effort was to insure systematic consideration of qualified employees in broad areas of selection. In fact, one of the principles was that "Attention shall also be given to the qualifications of individuals outside of the agency who might be available, in order to insure that the best qualified persons will be selected according to merit." Significantly, the concept of seniority was not even mentioned. Most agencies have announced promotion programs, and these are subject to review during the Commission's regular inspections. A frequent criticism made by the inspectors is that competition for promotion is confined to too narrow an organizational area. The Commission has recently issued a handbook for agency use giving examples of the best practices found in the federal service.³⁵

³⁵ Building Better Promotion Programs (Personnel Management Series No. 2) July, 1952.

The selection of employees for their first supervisory jobs is a particularly crucial phase of the promotion process. Mere length of service or technical competence is not enough; potential supervisory ability is the key. In recent years the Navy Department and the Commission have worked out a competitive plan for selecting blue-collar supervisors in the naval shipyards in which workers are ranked according to ratings on a written supervisory judgment test and evaluations by their superiors. The results seem to indicate that leadership factors can be successfully weighed.

Development of an Administrative Corps. The Hoover Commission recommended that the Civil Service Commission be required to identify the jobs which could be appropriately classified as administrative. This recommendation merely hinted at the real problem, which was stated more explicitly in the fourth finding of the Commission's General Management report:

The Federal Government has not taken aggressive steps to build a corps of administrators of the highest level of ability with an interest in the program of the Government as a whole.³⁶

Although no formal administrative corps exists today, progress has been made in recent years in developing able administrative personnel. Some former interns of the National Institute of Public Affairs have attained the highest career ranks in the years since 1934, and those coming through the Civil Service Commission's internship programs, beginning in 1944, are well started up the ladder. The annual intake of JMA's, reaching five or six hundred a year, promises well for the decades ahead. Typically the young people who have entered the service through these varied programs have sought their own opportunities across bureau and departmental lines. Many have worked in three or more agencies and on the way have acquired the interest in the government program as a whole that the Hoover Commission stressed.

A striking development of postwar years is the growing federal interest in executive development. Here private business took the lead. James V. Forrestal, while Secretary of Defense, requested the Navy Department to make a study of the leading industrial programs. The report exercised a great influence among federal administrators.³⁷ The need for rotational training and a broad outlook is especially acute in the federal service because of the high degree of specialization. The Civil Service Commission was made aware of this problem several years ago while exploring the possibility of an executive-development program. It found its own qualification requirements for administrative jobs to be a serious barrier to the plan. In 1949 the Commission proposed a program to the Federal Personnel Council to encourage rotational assignments among the various administrative specialties. The original proposal was limited to employees already in some phase of administrative work. At the Council's suggestion the program was broadened to include specialists outside of the administrative field. Thus an engineer, a chemist, or a forester, for example, who has shown leadership ability can undergo administrative experience and training with the objective of preparing himself for an administrative post in his professional field.

The Commission has appointed a Director of Executive Development Programs to assist federal agencies in establishing and conducting executive-development programs, and has completed executive-development agreements with seven departments and agencies.³⁸ In 1952 the Commission began a career development program to train a selected number of agency employees centrally, in order to bridge the gap between internship programs and higher-level executive development efforts. After six months of work assignments in several agencies and seminars with their fellows from other agencies, trainees return to the job with a broad view of federal administrative problems. Here in a modest way may be the beginnings of the "pool of career administrators" recommended by John J. Corson.³⁹

Transfer Program. The Hoover Commission recommended that the Civil Service Commission be authorized to develop a program to facilitate transfer of competent career personnel—particularly in the technical, scientific, and executive areas—from one agency to another. The desirability of this proposal was generally recognized, although the Civil Service Commission suggested that it be limited to "grades or classes of positions which represent in one or more agencies a ceiling of opportunity, or 'blind alley.'"⁴⁰

A beginning along the lines of the Hoover Commission proposal was made in 1946 when, at the suggestion of the Federal Personnel Council, the Civil Service Commission organized the Interdepartmental Placement Committee. This committee, composed of the placement officers of some 40 federal agencies, meets once a week to exchange information concerning current vacancies in the higher grades and available career employees. The number of higher level placements is not great, possibly 300 to 400 a year, but to this extent the committee fulfills a need.⁴¹ In 1951 another step towards a systematic plan for transferring career administrators was taken when an examination for "Federal Administrators" was announced. Competition was limited to current federal employees at GS-12 and above regardless of occupational field. Competitors were given a difficult written test in administrative judgment and the higher ranking candidates were referred for consideration to the defense agencies. A number of transfers and promotions have resulted, although the great expansion was over by the time the list was ready. The Commission's Career Service Section has added the records to its referral service for federal administrative personnel.

Employee Training. The Hoover Commission recommended enactment of legislation which would clearly set forth the policy of the federal government on the conduct of training programs for civilian employees. This recommendation pointed to the need for clarification of legal authorization for employee training. Some agencies over the years have succeeded in establishing well organized training programs with full legislative approval: for example, the FBI, the Foreign Service, and the military departments. Because of unfavorable decisions of the Comptroller General in the past, many agencies have hesitated to carry on organized training in the absence of specific legislative authority. There has been a feeling in the executive branch that Congress might not be sympathetic to the expenditure of funds for training. Actually there are indications to the contrary in both houses of Congress. The Rees report of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee on federal personnel activities supported the expenditure of personnel office funds for legitimate training.⁴² The Senate Subcommittee on Federal Manpower Policies has likewise endorsed the need for strengthened training programs.⁴³

Any doubts about employee training that exist in the legislative branch may reflect a feeling that some federal agencies have "gone overboard" in establishing elaborate and unnecessary programs. Members of Congress are particularly suspicious of attempts to hire untrained clerks and give them stenographic and typing training at government expense.⁴⁴ It is clear that Congress does not favor official training in basic skills which applicants can reasonably be expected to acquire at their own expense before presenting themselves for employment. This is far removed from legitimate types of in-service training; for example, training in matters peculiar to government employment, such as customs regulations.

The Hoover Commission's recommendation was embodied in S. 2111 and H. R. 5181 as section 11, the wording of which represented several years of work by the Council's Training Committee. The section would have authorized agencies to conduct training programs themselves and to send employees to educational institutions, research laboratories, etc., for training. The Commission would have been authorized to carry on research and establish a clearinghouse and reference service on training materials. The section was not included in the Federal Personnel Recruitment bills, but a revised version was proposed by the Commission and introduced by Senator Olin D. Johnston in the second session of the 82nd Congress as S. 2987. Representative Katharine St. George introduced a slightly modified version as H. R. 8013. No action was taken on these bills. Late in the session Senator Johnston, as Chairman of the Subcommittee on Federal Manpower Policies, reintroduced the Commission's version as S. 3494 with tighter restrictions and a parallel section governing the training of military personnel.

Today the Commission is resuming its active interest in the training field that was interrupted in 1946 by the termination of its Personnel Management Advisory Service because of lack of funds. Recently, at the Council's request, the Commission started a modest training reference service to gather examples of agency training materials for use by training officials.

Employee Participation in Determining Personnel Policies. The Hoover Commission recommended that the President require the heads of agencies to provide for employee participation in formulating personnel policies. Although this recommendation did not require legislative action, it was included as section 8 (d) in the Federal Personnel Policy bills. The Civil Service Commission expressed sympathy with the idea, but advised against the adoption of a mandatory rule on the subject.⁴⁵ Bills introduced by Representative George M. Rhodes provided that an administrator would be required to consult with union representatives at their request under penalty of suspension or dismissal for failure to do so.⁴⁶ The Commission objected to the punitive provisions and suggested that no legislation was necessary, since the goals could be achieved by administrative action.

Some steps have been taken in the executive branch since publication of the Hoover Commission report. Agencies such as TVA and Bonneville Power Administration had previously established well developed plans for union-management consultations.⁴⁷ Other agencies have recently worked out plans for dealing with unions or for direct consultation with employees. In 1952, the Navy Department announced a plan for systematic consultation with union representatives on all important personnel policies. The Commission occasionally holds informal discussions with heads of the leading employee unions on major policy issues affecting federal employment.

For some years the Commission has required agencies to consult with employees on specified personnel policies. The standards for approval of agency grievance procedures, first published in 1941, require that both supervisors and employees shall have an opportunity to participate in developing the procedures. In at least one case formal approval of an agency's plan was withheld until this was done. The standards for agency promotion plans, published in 1950, contain a similar provision. The guides for agency personnel operations require agencies to provide for "consideration of employee views in the formulation and adjustment of policies that affect him as a worker."⁴⁸

Performance Ratings. The Hoover Commission urged simplification of the existing efficiency rating system and recommended that it be used solely for developing a better understanding between supervisors and employees rather than for salary increases, lay-offs, and dismissals. In its own way this recommendation was as drastic as the one regarding category rating, since efficiency ratings had traditionally been used in federal, state, and local merit systems as a means of administering rewards and punishments. The Civil Service Commission itself had become dissatisfied with the uniform rating system then in use, and had decided to try to make ratings more realistic. For two years the Commission had conducted a pilot study of a new performance rating plan in its own organization. The actual duties of the job, instead of uniform government-wide elements such as "industry" and "dependability," were used as rating elements.⁴⁹

S. 2111 contained a section on "Appraisals of Performance" (section 9). In reporting to the Senate Committee on this bill, the Civil Service Commission endorsed the Hoover Commission's stand with one important difference: it recommended that no evaluation system be required by law. Its memorandum to the President of March 23, 1949 stated: "The opportunity to discover that efficiency ratings may be advantageous to management and employees is too frequently lost in the surge of resentment against being compelled to do something that is not apparently necessary."

The new Classification Act required the Commission to study the rating problem and submit recommendations to the Congress by February 1, 1950.⁵⁰ The Commission's recommendations were along the general lines of the Hoover Commission's proposals with the difference noted above. Emphasis was placed on the purpose of performance evaluation rather than on the mechanics of rating. The Commission urged flexibility of rating systems rather than government-wide uniformity. Periodic conferences between employees and supervisors should be encouraged in order to achieve mutual understanding of performance requirements. Ratings should not be used as the sole basis of personnel actions. The Commission's report contained a draft of legislation which was introduced by Representative Tom Murray, Chairman of the House Committee, as H. R. 7264 on February 13, 1950. Shortly thereafter Chairman Murray introduced a new bill, H. R. 7824, representing a compromise between the Commission's draft and the existing system. The Commission, while preferring its own draft, accepted and endorsed the new bill with minor reservations.⁵¹ This was passed as the Performance Rating Act of 1950 (64 Stat. 1098).

It is interesting to note that over the past two years employee consultation has received more attention from the Federal Personnel Council than any other subject. Two comprehensive reports have resulted, "Guide for Employee Participation in Agency Management" and "Guide for Effective Relationships with Organized Employee Groups."

The new system differs somewhat from the recommendations of the Hoover Commission and the Civil Service Commission but aims at the same broad objectives. Ratings are still geared to certain personnel actions: extra retention credit for those rated "Outstanding," automatic pay increase within certain time periods for those rated at least "Satisfactory," and removal or reassignment for those rated "Unsatisfactory." Each agency is required to have a rating system and each agency's plan must be approved by the Commission, but great latitude is allowed in the details. An appeals system is still required. At the same time, the act gives recognition to the Hoover Commission recommendation in providing that employees shall be informed of proper performance requirements and in emphasizing the strengthening of supervisor-employee relations. Appeals have decreased greatly in number, and attention seems to have shifted from the search of the past decades for the perfect rating form.

Reduction in Force. In accordance with its fresh approach to other traditional civil-service practices, the Hoover Commission recommended a complete transformation of federal lay-off policies. It urged that emphasis be placed on determining which employees should be retained for continuing work, rather than on determining which should be eliminated under a rigid formula. To this end, employees would be ranked in quality categories similar to those recommended for category rating in entrance examinations. Some extra credit would be provided for seniority and military service, but the primary factor would be the employee's qualifications for the remaining work.

The Federal Personnel Council and the Civil Service Commission disagreed with the Commission's recommendations. The former approved the views of two study committees, which challenged the idea that the efficiency of the service would be promoted by deciding retention primarily according to fitness for the remaining work. The committees pointed out that a career service must give reasonable security in an employee's later years if the government is to hold him during his earlier and more productive period.⁵² The Civil Service Commission based its objections on the administrative difficulties involved:

The Commission agrees that existing reduction-in-force requirements should be modified, but feels that the proposal made in the report is too cumbersome to be practicable. The rating of each individual in a large unit where only a few are to be separated is expensive and unnecessary.⁵³

The recommendations have not resulted in legislative action. They were included in section 12 of the Federal Personnel Policy bills, and numerous other bills have been introduced embodying various formulas to solve the reduction-in-force problem.⁵⁴ The chief issue in recent years has been between the veterans' groups and employee unions as to the relative weights to be given military preference and seniority. The veterans' organizations have shown determined opposition to any change in section 12 of the Veterans' Preference Act of 1944.⁵⁵ This section requires that due effect in reductions in force be given to "tenure of employment, military preference, length of service, and efficiency ratings," with a proviso that veterans be given absolute priority within a tenure group regardless of length of service.

The Hoover Commission's personnel task force focused attention on the administrative complexity involved in the numerous reassignments resulting from a reduction in force.⁵⁶ The problem has been intensified by the fine distinctions in tenure applied under emergency procedures since Korea; in some cases four or five reassignments have resulted from the abolishment of a single position. To alleviate this problem the Commission recently announced a plan to restrict reassignment rights to permanent employees.⁵⁷

Special Consideration for Laid-Off Employees. The Hoover Commission recommended that career employees who are laid off be given top priority for any vacancies for which the Civil Service Commission considers them qualified, and that while awaiting placement they remain on the payroll for three months. Since 1946 priority consideration for "displaced career employees" has actually been required. At that time the Council and the Commission worked out a plan for referring such employees to other agencies. In fact, at one time the plan provided for displacing war-service employees with career employees who had been laid off in other agencies. As might be expected, agencies frequently objected that trained war-service employees had to be released to make room for less competent career workers. Expanding employment in the Korean emergency temporarily solved the problem.⁵⁸

No action has been taken to continue the pay of federal employees who are laid off in reductions in force. Several bills to grant severance pay under these conditions have been introduced but not acted upon.⁵⁹

Dismissals for Inefficiency. The Hoover Commission recommended a more workable method for separating inefficient employees. The report outlined a procedure requiring the supervisor to present the facts regarding an employee's alleged incompetence through the director of personnel to the under secretary. A designated official would then investigate the case. If the employee were a probationer he would be dismissed without appeal if the facts justified it. An employee who had completed probation would be given a letter of charges and provided a hearing. If the charges were sustained, he would be dismissed at the end of 30 days, within which he could appeal to the Civil Service Commission. If the Commission accepted his appeal, he would remain on the payroll until the final decision.

The report stated that this procedure would speed removal action. As the Federal Personnel Council pointed out, however, the plan did not represent a simplification of existing procedures.⁶⁰ In many departments it would have required a recentralization of removal powers which have long been delegated to subordinate operating officials. Probationers, both veterans and nonveterans, now can be removed without hearing or appeal by a simple letter stating their shortcomings, and no review by headquarters authority is required by civil-service regulations. Nonveterans, representing 53 per cent of the whole service, today have no appeal rights to the Civil Service Commission on the merits of their cases. Even among veterans, only a small proportion of those who are discharged for cause now appeal to the Commission. The proposed procedure would offer the chance of a cash bonus to any employee who appealed to the Commission, since if his case were accepted for hearing he would continue on the payroll until the final decision, whether favorable or unfavorable to him.

The Commission expressed general agreement with the recommendations, but felt that nonveterans should not be given appeal rights outside their agencies.⁶¹ The Council took the same view. Section 8 of the Federal Personnel Policy bills included the major points of the recommendations without the detailed procedural steps. In May, 1952 Chairman Murray of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service introduced H. R. 7845 to grant nonveterans approximately the same appeal rights to the Commission that veterans already have. Hearings were conducted (unpublished), but no action resulted.

Three steps have been taken by the Commission to speed removal of incompetents. (1) In July, 1950 the three Commissioners signed a circular to all agency heads urging them to take prompt removal action when necessary and to eliminate successive layers of hearings.⁶² (2) In January, 1952 the Commission issued instructions requiring federal supervisors to make written appraisals of the performance of each probationer after ten months of service, to insure that incompetents do not slip into the permanent force by default.⁶³ (3) Recently, the Commission reviewed its own procedure for hearing appeals of veterans who were removed by agencies, and announced a simplified procedure which provides for only one hearing in the average case.⁶⁴ Previously it was fairly common for cases to be heard in a regional office and later in Washington.

As in any large organization, removals for inefficiency in the federal service will always present a problem, and there is no simple answer. Discharges for all reasons (aside from lay-offs) now occur at the rate of about 24,000 a year, thus demonstrating the falsity of the popular myth that "You can't fire a government worker." A sample survey by the Commission in July, 1950 showed that of 2,287 removals under charges, 827 or 36 per cent were for inefficiency. The next largest categories were abuse of leave (24 per cent) and crime or fraud related to work (9 per cent).⁶⁵ Despite these statistics, many administrators remain convinced that present removal procedures are too cumbersome.⁶⁶ The problem for the future is to find a method that will insure prompt removal of the unfit while preserving reasonable safeguards against arbitrary action.

Better Working Relationships. Although the efficiency-rating recommendations touched on the desirability of better relationships between employees and supervisors, the Hoover Commission majority report did not make a major point of the matter. Commissioner Pollock was more specific. Under the heading "A Modern Concept of Personnel Administration" he deplored the emphasis on personnel techniques and urged a deeper study of human motivation:

... The employee must be made to feel that he belongs in the organization, that he is creatively, not passively participating, and that he is contributing to its total effort. ...

In terms of modern management, this means that we must develop a personnel program which has more concern with people than with procedures; which gives more attention to motivation, incentives, and morale than to the refinements of written examinations, pay plans, and service ratings.⁶⁷

These comments were generally overlooked in the debate over more controversial issues. Nevertheless, the concept of developing better working relationships is spreading in the federal service. The work of industrial concerns and universities in the field of human relations is reflected in numerous employee handbooks and supervisory training manuals published by federal agencies.⁶⁸ Much recent research in this field was done under Navy grants to universities and became readily available to civilian personnel officials.⁶⁹ The various management societies in Washington also have stressed this topic in their discussions. In fact, the movement has gained such momentum in American life that at least one critic has felt the need to administer an antidote.⁷⁰ is one of mixed failure and achievement. The most far-reaching legislative proposals have not yet been attained: those providing for further decentralization of recruitment, category ratings, training authority, comprehensive pay legislation, and a revised reduction-in-force system. Many of the recommendations requiring administrative action are partially in effect, or at least some action has been initiated. Here the critic can point to failures of quality or scope, but not to total inaction. Not all observers would agree with the statement of the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments in 1950 that "The record of the entire Federal structure with respect to the Hoover Commission report in personnel management is remarkably good."⁷¹ Nevertheless, the Hoover Commission already deserves high rank among the major study groups that have speeded the progress of personnel management in the federal service.

Since 1949 those who believe that federal recruitment should be centrally operated have gathered considerable ammunition from allegations of sales of federal offices and other abuses of merit principles. They can charge that current standards of political morality indicate that a restrictive central merit system is as badly needed as it was in 1883. Perhaps the truth lies in an intermediate position. Many federal agencies have demonstrated complete faith in merit principles, while others have shown themselves susceptible to personal or political pressures. If the law were sufficiently flexible, the Civil Service Commission could recognize this disparity in the degree of surveillance that it exercised. It could apply the traditional type of merit system to the laggards, and to the leaders it could grant the latitude recommended by a majority of the Hoover Commission. Possibly to a few outstanding agencies it might even grant the responsibility and freedom for experimentation urged by Commissioner Pollock.

The 83rd Congress and the new administration may be expected to scrutinize carefully the remaining personnel recommendations in the Hoover Commission report. Much work has already been done by the Senate Subcommittee on Federal Manpower Policies, by Temple University, and by the Rockefeller Committee. Even if the unfulfilled recommendations of the Commission were put into effect, however, the federal personnel structure still would not represent the best of all possible worlds. Some matters the Commission overlooked; for example, the need for intensive personnel research on selection methods and on ways to increase output on the job. And in recent years many new problems have crowded to the front, such as the loyalty and security issue, the need for better personnel practices affecting many thousands of employees serving overseas, the problem of reconciling the civil-service retirement and social-security systems, and the need for an appointment system which can adjust itself to expansions and contractions of the service without a paroxysm of executive orders and regulation-writing. These will warrant as careful study as the unfinished business of the Hoover Commission report.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW IN 1951-1952

DAVID FELLMAN

University of Wisconsin

The 1951 Term of the Supreme Court,¹ during which there was no change in its makeup, continued to exhibit the behavior pattern of the previous Term, both in the mechanics of operation² and the drift of decision. The work of the Truman Court is a compound of new Justices and the shifting concatenation of historical forces. It operates amidst the strains and tensions of the Cold War. The leading cases of this Term, dealing with such subjects as presidential seizure of private property, the treatment of aliens, by-products of the trials of Communists, and the pressure on civil liberties generally, all reflect the push of current history.

The total number of dispositions during the 1951 Term, 1207, was almost the same as the number for the 1950 Term, which was 1202. There were only 83 signed opinions, as compared with 98 in the 1950 Term and 87 in the 1949 Term. Twenty-five years ago the number of signed opinions averaged around 200 per Term. The reduction in the number of signed opinions was matched by a growing number of dispositions on the merits by memorandum order. The Court disposed of 200 cases on the merits; 101 came up by appeal (in about equal numbers from the federal district courts and the state courts) and 99 reached the Court on certiorari (72 from the federal Courts of Appeals, 24 from state courts, and 2 from the Court of Claims). The Court continued to keep a tight rein on its discretionary jurisdiction.³ On the appellate docket it denied certiorari in 511 cases, dismissed 9 petitions, and granted 93 (15.2%). On the miscellaneous docket it denied 382, dismissed five, and granted 19 (4.7%). Some choices, as always, are difficult to explain, for the Court agreed to review some cases of minor importance,⁴ and denied certiorari in seemingly important litigation.⁵

In addition to the denials of certiorari, it should be noted that 50 appeals were dismissed, 37 for want of a substantial federal question. Since the Court must pass judgment on the question of substantiality, its so-called compulsory jurisdiction has a strong element of discretion in it. The only difference between a dismissal of an appeal for lack of a substantial federal question and a denial of a petition for certiorari is that in the latter case no reason is ordinarily given, whereas in the former the Court must at least assert the absence, in its judgment, of a substantial issue.

During the 1951 Term 104 cases were disposed of with full opinion, with 90 opinions being written, of which seven were per curiam. Of these cases, 24 (27%) commanded unanimous votes, and there were one or more dissents in 66 (73%). Seventy-nine cases were disposed of on the merits by memorandum order, 52 (66%) with unanimous votes, and 27 (34%) with dissents. In all, 73 dissenting opinions were filed; Justice Black wrote 16, Justice Douglas 15, Justice Frankfurter 14, and Justice Jackson 9; on the other hand, Chief Justice Vinson and Justice Burton each prepared only three dissenting opinions, and Justice Clark none at all. In all cases decided on the merits, whether with full opinion or by memorandum order, Justice Black dissented in 50, Justice Douglas in 43, Justice Reed in 29, and at the other extreme, Chief Justice Vinson dissented 15 times, Justice Minton 14 times, and Justice Clark only once. There were in all 211 dissenting votes. In addition, there were 19 concurring opinions, Justices Douglas, Frankfurter and Jackson each filing four, and the Chief Justice and Justice Minton none. In six cases the decisions below were affirmed by an equally-divided Court.

In connection with memorandum orders denying certiorari or dealing with miscellaneous applications, Justice Black dissented 19 times and Justice Douglas 12 times; on the other hand, Justice Jackson dissented three times, and Justices Clark and Reed only once each. In addition, Justice Frankfurter filed three "memoranda," his view being that while it is impossible for the Justices to give reasons in writing for refusing certiorari, it is occasionally appropriate to explain the issues at stake in litigation where the Court refused to exercise its review powers. When the Court voted to grant certiorari in the steel seizure case,⁶ Justices Burton and Frankfurter did the unusual thing of recording their dissents.

While the vote of four Justices is sufficient to grant certiorari, it is possible for a bare majority of five to dismiss the petition after argument without deciding the controversy on its merits. Justice Frankfurter maintained, in United States v. Shannon,⁷ that since it then appeared that certiorari had been improvidently granted, the case being unique and not presenting a problem of general importance, the Court should not hesitate to correct the original mistake by dismissing the writ. In another case decided the same day, Justice Frankfurter insisted that the writ should be dismissed as improvidently granted, with the result that since the Court was otherwise evenly divided, the judgment of the court below was affirmed.⁸ Thus no opinion was written to dispose of a case that four Justices had voted to hear. In the Shannon case Justice Douglas sharply disagreed with Justice Frankfurter's view. He declared:

A Justice who has voted to deny the writ of certiorari is in no position after argument to vote to dismiss the writ as improvidently granted. Only those who have voted to grant the writ have that privilege. The reason strikes deep. If after the writ is granted or after argument, those who voted to deny certiorari vote to dismiss the writ as improvidently granted, the integrity of our certiorari jurisdiction is impaired. By long practice—announced to the Congress and well-known to this Bar—it takes four votes out of a Court of nine to grant a petition for certiorari. If four can grant and the opposing five dismiss, then the four cannot get a decision of the case on the merits. The integrity of the four-vote rule on certiorari would then be impaired.

On the other hand, it still remains true that after four Justices have voted to grant certiorari, argument is presented to the whole Court on the merits of the case in the light of its record. The will of the four who favored granting certiorari, therefore, is not altogether frustrated.⁹

I. QUESTIONS OF NATIONAL POWER

1. SEPARATION OF POWERS: THE PRESIDENT'S AUTHORITY

Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer,¹⁰ decided on June 2, 1952, was by all odds the most elaborately-argued and discussed case of the Term.¹¹ Not since the Myers case,¹² of a quarter a century ago, has the Court come to grips with such a fundamental aspect of the boundaries of presidential power. This litigation dealt with the question of the President's power to seize private property at a time of alleged crisis. The seizure came as a climax to a long dispute between the steel companies and their employees. On December 18, 1951, the Union gave notice of its intention to strike on December 31. Following the intervention and failure of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, the President referred the dispute, on December 22, to the Federal Wage Stabilization Board. In other words, the President chose to act under the Defense Production Act of 1950 rather than the Taft-Hartley Act. The Board's report did not bring about a settlement, and on April 4, 1952, the Union gave notice of a nation-wide strike, to begin April 9. Believing that steel production was indispensable and that a stoppage would jeopardize national defense, the President ordered Secretary of Commerce Sawyer, a few hours before the strike was to begin, to take possession of and operate most of the steel mills. The following day the President sent a message to Congress reporting his action, and twelve days later he sent a second message. Congress took no action.

On April 30, Judge Pine of the District Court of the District of Columbia issued a preliminary injunction on petition of the steel companies.¹³ The Court of Appeals, sitting in banc on the same day, issued a stay.¹⁴ The Supreme Court, to which the United States immediately petitioned for review, granted certiorari on May 3.¹⁵ Thus the Court of Appeals did not review the case at all. This falls within the terms of the jurisdictional statute which provides that certiorari lies to review cases in the Courts of Appeals "before or after rendition of judgment or decree."¹⁶ In other words, the Supreme Court need only wait for the case to reach the Court of Appeals, though it very rarely takes the case before the Court of Appeals has made its decision.¹⁷ Justices Burton and Frankfurter voted to deny certiorari, the former filing a statement protesting the bypassing of the Court of Appeals. He maintained that the issues were such as to require all the wisdom the judicial process makes available, and that it was more important to have a sound result than a quick one. But the Court majority was in a hurry. Oral argument was set for May 12, and the decision was announced on June 2. Where there is a will, there is a way.

The Supreme Court sustained the District Court by a six-to-three vote. Justice Black delivered the opinion of the Court, but each of the Justices who concurred with him, Frankfurter, Douglas, Jackson and Burton, filed his own opinion. Justice Clark concurred separately in the judgment of the Court but not in its opinion. The views of the dissenters, Vinson, Reed and Minton, were set forth by the Chief Justice in a long and vigorous opinion. All in all, these seven opinions contain a vast amount of material on the office of the chief executive. Since everyone agreed that Congress could authorize seizure under its eminent domain power, the case turned on the inferences to be drawn from the legislation already on the books and the nature of the President's constitutional powers. The government rested its case upon a theory of inherent presidential powers to deal with a national emergency. Neither the President nor the Solicitor General relied upon the seizure provisions of the Defense Production Act or of the Selective Service Act of 1948.

Considering the magnitude of the issues, the amount of public interest, and the expansiveness of his colleagues, Justice Black's opinion for the Court was unusually brief, and on the crucial constitutional issue almost peremptory. Apparently his rather general statement was all that a bare majority of the Court would go along with. Justice Black first of all rejected the argument that the injunction should be denied on the non-constitutional grounds of the absence of irreparable damage and the existence of adequate legal remedies for compensation for any possible damages. He doubted whether there would be any right to recover in the Court of Claims, and took the position that seizure was certain to result in damages which it would be difficult if not impossible to measure.¹⁸ He noted that no statute either expressly or impliedly authorized the seizure, and pointed out that before this controversy arose, Congress refused to adopt the seizure technique for settling labor disputes, and specifically rejected an amendment, when the Taft-Hartley Act was under consideration, which would have authorized seizure in cases of emergency. He took this to mean that Congress had its own theory about collective bargaining.

Justice Black proceeded to a consideration of the argument that the aggregate of constitutional powers vested in the President in Article II supports the seizure order. He did not find justification in the President's military powers as commander-in-chief, noting that cases dealing with the broad powers of military commanders in theatres of war were of no concern here. The President as commander-in-chief does not have "the ultimate power as such to take possession of private property in order to keep labor disputes from stopping production. This is a job for the Nation's lawmakers, not for its military authorities." Nor was the seizure order justified by the constitutional clauses vesting the executive power in the President. His power is to enforce the laws, not make them; his law-making functions are limited by the Constitution to recommending laws and the veto. The Constitution clearly vests the lawmaking power in Congress. And while Congress undoubtedly has the power to authorize the taking of private property for public use, and can regulate labor-employer relationships, "the Constitution did not subject this law-making power of Congress to presidential or military supervision or control."

Justice Black rather summarily dismissed the argument that other Presidents have without congressional authority taken possession of private business enterprises to settle labor disputes. Even if this is true, he maintained, Congress has not thereby lost its exclusive constitutional authority to make all necessary and proper laws. He concluded: "The Founders of this Nation entrusted the lawmaking power to the Congress alone in both good and bad times. It would do no good to recall the historical events, the fears of power and the hopes for freedom that lay behind their choice. Such a review would but confirm our holding that this seizure order cannot stand."

In his incisive opinion, Justice Jackson discussed the scope of presidential power in three different situations. First, when the President acts pursuant to congressional authorization, his authority is at a maximum. Secondly, in the absence of a congressional grant or denial, there may be an independent presidential responsibility. Thirdly, when the President acts contrary to the expressed or implied will of Congress, his power is at its lowest ebb. In this case Congress has neither authorized this sort of seizure nor has it been silent on the subject, for it embodied its policy in several statutes. Turning to the Article II considerations, he noted that the executive powers of the President are enumerated, not given in blanket form, and that the President is commander-in-chief of the army and the navy, not of the country, its industries and inhabitants. Even assuming that we are at war, he was unwilling to believe that this alone empowered the President to seize industries, for the power to raise and support armies is vested in Congress. Finally, he considered the appeal to inherent emergency powers dangerous, and not warranted by any provision of the Constitution. He cited the example of Germany to illustrate the dangers involved, and called attention to the fact that in both France and Great Britain emergency executive powers always rest upon legislation. Describing how potent the presidential office has already become, Justice Jackson refused to believe that it would suffer if the Court declined further to aggrandize it.

Justice Burton wrote: "The controlling fact here is that Congress, within its constitutionally delegated power, has prescribed for the President specific procedures, exclusive of seizure, for his use in meeting the present type of emergency. Congress has reserved to itself the right to determine where and when to authorize the seizure of property in meeting such an emergency." As for the inherent constitutional power of the President, Justice Burton said that this situation was not comparable to imminent invasion or threatened attack, and took the position that the order in question was not the military command of the commander-in-chief to a mobilized nation waging a war or imminently threatened with war.

Justice Clark agreed that where Congress has laid down specific procedures to deal with the type of crisis confronting the President, the latter must follow them; but in the absence of such action by Congress, he thought the President had an independent power to act which "depends upon the gravity of the situation confronting the nation." He also expressed the opinion that the President could have acted under the seizure provision of the Selective Service Act of 1948, but chose not to do so. No other Justice agreed on this last point.

The presence of emergency conditions, Justice Douglas argued, does not transfer the legislative power to the President. Conceding that the Executive can move more swiftly, Justice Douglas developed the thought that the separation of powers principle was not designed to promote efficiency, but rather to preclude the exercise of arbitrary power. Furthermore, he pointed out that the seizure of property is a taking in a constitutional sense, and therefore carries with it a duty to pay. This is a congressional prerogative, for the President cannot raise revenue.

Reviewing the problem in historical perspective, Justice Frankfurter concluded that every time Congress has authorized executive seizure (16 times since 1916), it has carefully circumscribed the grant of power, by fixing time limits and describing detailed conditions, with special attention to the question of compensation. Here Congress has not given the President any such power. Nor did he believe that seizure power was derived from the constitutional grant of the power faithfully to execute the laws. There were three cases of seizure without statutory authority in the period from June to December, 1941, but this did not add up, in his view, to a long-continued practice which established a construction of the Constitution.

In his dissenting opinion, Chief Justice Vinson began by describing in considerable detail the state of our international relations, including the Korean War, the Truman Doctrine, the Marshall Plan, the North Atlantic Treaty, and the threat of Russian military power. He then summarized the large body of implementing legislation which Congress has enacted to carry out our international responsibilities, the appropriation since June, 1950, of $130 billions for defense and military assistance, the Mutual Security, Selective Service and Defense Production Acts, and others. The President, he insisted, has the duty of executing all these legislative programs, and their success depends upon continued production of steel and stabilized prices for steel. Reciting the great constitutional powers of the President, he reasoned that it was "apparent that the Presidency was deliberately fashioned as an office of power and independence." While the President is not an autocrat, neither is he an automaton, impotent to act at a time when the Republic's survival is at stake.

The Chief Justice reviewed rather discursively and uncritically the history of executive action, with or without statutory authorization, in times of national emergencies, ranging from President Washington's intervention in the Whiskey Rebellion to President Truman's decision to send troops to Korea. His conclusion was that "Presidents have taken prompt action to enforce the laws and protect the country whether or not Congress happened to provide in advance for the particular method of execution." In this instance President Truman had acted to carry forward two legislative programs, military procurement and price stabilization. Thus he was executing the laws. Unlike an administrative agency or a subordinate official, the President is a constitutional officer taking care that a mass of legislation is executed. Flexibility of execution to meet critical situations is a matter of practical necessity. The Chief Justice emphasized the gravity of the emergency, and argued that in times of great peril the Executive must not be weak. He accused the majority of holding a "messenger-boy concept" of the office of President. "Presidents have been in the past, and any man worthy of the Office should be in the future, free to take at least interim action necessary to execute legislative programs essential to survival of the Nation." Finally, he stressed throughout that the seizure was temporary, that the President reported promptly to Congress, and that the seizure was subject to approval, or disapproval, or change, by Congress, whenever it chose to act.

2. FEDERAL RIGHTS

Right to Privacy. Whether a public transportation utility may inflict commercial radio programs upon its "captive" audiences was the interesting question litigated in Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia v. Pollak.¹⁹ The Capital Transit Company, which operates the street railway and bus system of Washington, D. C., installed "music as you ride" radio programs, consisting of about 90% music, 5% news, weather reports and matters of civic interest, and 5% commercial advertising. The Company took a poll of its passengers and reported that 92% favored continuance of the programs. The Utilities Commission of the District ordered an investigation, after protests were made, and concluded that these radio programs did not interfere with public convenience, comfort or safety. On the appeal of several passengers, the Court of Appeals held that objecting passengers were deprived of liberty without due process, insofar as commercials and announcements were concerned.²⁰ The Supreme Court reversed.

Speaking for the Court, Justice Burton agreed that while the First and Fifth Amendments restrict only the federal government and not private parties, there was a sufficiently close relationship between the government and this radio service to bring the matter within the scope of the Bill of Rights. The Company had a substantial monopoly as a public utility under an authorization by Congress, and operated under the regulatory supervision of a federal agency. It was concluded that there was no violation of the First Amendment, first, because the testimony did not show any substantial interference with the passengers' freedom of conversation, and secondly, because there was no substance to the claim that the programs had been used for disseminating objectionable propaganda. The assertion that the due process right of privacy was invaded was also rejected on the ground that the Fifth Amendment does not secure to each passenger on a public vehicle regulated by the federal government a right of privacy substantially equal to the privacy one is entitled to in his own home. When one rides in a public conveyance, Justice Burton asserted, the right of privacy is "substantially limited by the rights of others." He also stressed the fact that the majority of passengers approved of the programs, and that the Commission had reached its conclusion only after notice, investigation and public hearings.

Justice Black concurred on the due process issue, and agreed that music programs do not violate the First Amendment, but he thought otherwise insofar as passengers were subjected to the broadcasting of news, views, public speeches, or propaganda of any kind. Justice Frankfurter took no part in the case, saying that his feelings were "so strongly engaged as a victim of the practice in controversy" he had better not sit in judicial judgment. Justice Douglas dissented, asserting that the practice violated the due process right to privacy, which is "the beginning of all freedom." He thought the passengers were subjected to a form of coercion, since they have no real choice but to ride on the vehicles, and sit and listen. He expressed the fear that once privacy is invaded, it is gone, and while today it is the radio program of a business enterprise, tomorrow it may be a dominant political or religious group which seeks to force its views upon captive audiences.

Deportation of Aliens. It is a sign of the times that some of the most significant decisions of the 1951 Term dealt with the treatment of aliens.²¹ The leading case was Harisiades v. Shaughnessy,²² where the Court was called upon to decide whether the United States may constitutionally deport a legally resident alien because of a membership in the Communist party which terminated before enactment of the Alien Registration Act of 1940, which authorized such deportation. The three appellants all admitted membership for some periods of time prior to 1940. Each lower court made a finding that the Communist party, during the period of the alien's membership, taught and advocated the overthrow of the government of the United States by force and violence. The Court held that such deportation was not in conflict with the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment. The government, Justice Jackson asserted, has always had the power to terminate its hospitality to aliens, and while the expulsion of aliens long resident here entails hardships, the power to expel them, like the power to exclude, is a weapon of defense and reprisal confirmed by international law as an inherent power of every sovereign state. Whether the congressional policy is harsh or unreasonable is not a question for judges to answer; it is up to the political branches of the government to frame a policy in an area so vitally and intricately connected with the conduct of foreign relations, the war power, and the maintenance of the republican form of government. Justice Jackson pointed out that the present statute was enacted by Congress as a result of the Court's decision in 1939 in the Kessler case,²³ wherein it was ruled that the act dealing with the deportation of subversives was intended to reach only those aliens who were members of subversive organizations at the time the proceedings against them were instituted. The Court could not say that the congressional alarm concerning the Communist conspiracy was either a fantasy or a pretense when the bill was passed in 1940.

²¹ See Ellen Raphael Knauff, The Ellen Knauff Story (New York, 1952).

²³ Kessler v. Strecker, 307 U.S. 22 (1939).

The Court also ruled that the deportation law did not violate the First Amendment, for the Constitution does not prevent Congress from making a distinction between advocacy of change by lawful processes and change by force and violence. Under our Constitution, Justice Jackson pointed out, there is no excuse for a violent attack on the status quo, since there is the legal alternative of the ballot. It is true that it is hard to draw the line, but the problem is not solved by suppressing everything, as the Communists do, or suppressing nothing short of this side of immediate success. Justice Jackson thought that the test was fully discussed in the recent Dennis case,²⁴ and didn't require re-statement. Finally he ruled that the statute was not ex post facto, because the 1940 Act was actually a continuation of prior legislation dating from 1920; these aliens, therefore, were adequately forewarned. But even if the Act is retroactive, it was argued that the ex post facto clause applies only to penal legislation, and deportation, however severe its consequences, has consistently been classified as a civil procedure. As an original proposal Justice Jackson conceded that this might be considered debatable, but he insisted that it was well established in statutory and decisional law.

It was argued that the congressional policy permitted no escape by reformation. Again, said Justice Jackson, the wisdom of a policy of "atonement and redemption" is for Congress and not the judiciary to decide upon. Furthermore, when the Communist party as a matter of strategy formally expelled alien members en masse, following the adoption of the 1940 Act, it destroyed any significance that discontinued membership might otherwise have as evidence of a change of heart.

Justice Douglas filed a dissenting opinion in which Justice Black concurred. He noted that the conception of an absolute congressional deportation power was based on the old Fong Yue Ting case,²⁵ and thought this precedent was inconsistent with the philosophy of constitutional law which the Court has since developed for the protection of resident aliens. A resident alien is a person within the meaning of the due process clauses, and is entitled to the basic guarantees of liberty and livelihood. He thought that Justice Brewer's dissenting protest in Fong Yue Ting against the doctrine of inherent powers as both indefinite and dangerous had grown in persuasiveness with the passing years. And he insisted that banishment was punishment in the practical sense. He conceded that Congress could deport dangerous aliens, but here aliens were ordered deported not for what they are but for what they once were, thus ruling out "the principle of forgiveness and the doctrine of redemption," which seem in his view to be part of our constitutional law.

Another important case dealing with the deportation of aliens, and decided by a five-to-four vote, was Carlson v. Landon.²⁶ Section 23 of the Internal Security Act of 1950 authorizes the Attorney General to hold alien Communists in custody without bail, at his discretion, pending determination of their deportability. The Court had no doubt of the validity of the statutory provision making Communist membership alone a sufficient ground for deportation, since the doctrines and practices of Communism teach the use of force to achieve political control. Detention, it held, is a necessary part of the deportation procedure, and since not all aliens are necessarily dangerous, the 1950 Act gave the Attorney General discretion to grant or refuse bail. The legislative history, said Justice Reed, supports the government's contention that the Attorney General's discretion is not beyond judicial review, but that it is presumptively correct and unassailable except for abuse. Reviewing the facts of the five aliens involved in this litigation, Justice Reed concluded that since they were all active Communist party members, discretion to refuse bail was properly exercised.

²⁴ Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951).

The crucial question of the relationship of bail to the factor of availability for trial was relegated to a footnote. This was held to be of no great significance in security cases involving alien Communists. Furthermore, Justice Reed observed that the past record of Communists, in failing to show up for trial, was far from decisive against the Attorney General's action. He drew attention to a report filed by the Department of Justice at the request of the Court which showed that in fact a large majority of aliens arrested on warrants of deportation are granted bail. Justice Reed also held that Section 23 did not delegate legislative power unconstitutionally, because of the lack of standards, since in the light of the statute as a whole the Attorney General must have a wide discretion, each exercise of which Congress is not obliged to spell out in detail. Furthermore, the Attorney General's discretion is not untrammelled, since it is subject to judicial review, and the refusal of bail must be justified in terms of the purposes of the statute.

Finally, Justice Reed held that Section 23 did not violate the bail clause of the Eighth Amendment, which, he argued, has not prevented Congress from defining the classes of cases in which bail is not compulsory, as, for example, in criminal cases where the punishment may be death. In other words, the Eighth Amendment does not say that all arrests are bailable.

Justice Black castigated the Court for what he termed a "harsh holding," a decision in "shocking disregard" of the Eighth (bail), First (free speech) and Fifth (due process) Amendments. He stressed the fact that the aliens in question were not denied bail because if released they might try to evade obedience to possible deportation orders, but because they were regarded as security risks. Thus it follows that their imprisonment is unrelated to any question of deportation, and "a power to put in jail because dangerous cannot be derived from a power to deport." If Congress can authorize the imprisonment of dangerous alien Communists, it can authorize it for citizen Communists on the same grounds. Actually the Bureau agent could throw a citizen in jail merely by saying he is an alien. Justice Black also protested against the Attorney General's delegating this tremendous power to subordinates. More fundamentally he insisted that condemning people to jail is a job for the judiciary in accordance with due process which cannot be farmed out to the police and prosecuting attorneys. He maintained that to keep people in jail because of fear of their talk was a flat violation of the First Amendment, which "grants an absolute right to believe in any governmental system, discuss all governmental affairs, and argue for desired changes in the existing order." Finally, he thought the statute as construed violated the Eighth Amendment. He characterized the Court's ruling as a "weird, devitalizing interpretation" which reduces the Amendment to the level of "a pious admonition." For the Court ruled that the Eighth Amendment does not limit Congress, but only the courts.

In his dissenting opinion Justice Frankfurter emphasized that the Attorney General was given "discretion," not the power to decide arbitrarily, and that aliens arrested on warrants of deportation need bail for the same reasons that lead to bail where persons are held on serious criminal charges. He thought that the Attorney General had not in fact exercised discretion, but had made an abstract, class determination. Dissenting briefly, Justice Douglas stated that the expulsion of aliens for past actions or present expressions unaccompanied by conduct was more important than the bail issue. On the other hand, Justice Burton thought the bail issue was crucial, and argued that since the unreasonable denial of bail has the same consequence as excessive bail, the Eighth Amendment should be construed to prohibit unreasonable denial of bail.

Still another case involving the deportation of aliens was United States v. Spector,²⁷ decided by a five-to-three vote. At issue was a section of the Internal Security Act of 1950 providing that any alien against whom a specified order of deportation is outstanding "who shall willfully fail or refuse to depart from the United States within a period of six months from the date of such order of deportation, . . . or shall willfully fail or refuse to make timely application in good faith for travel or other documents necessary to his departure," shall be guilty of a felony. (Italics added.) The District Court dismissed an indictment on the ground that the statute was unconstitutionally vague and indefinite.²⁸ The Supreme Court reversed, Justice Douglas taking the view that the command of the statute was "simple and intelligible." He construed "timely" as meaning within six months, and said that which travel documents were needed depended upon the country the alien chooses to go to.

Justice Black thought the alien was forced to make a series of guesses, as to when an application is "timely," what constitutes a "good faith" application, what kind of "documents" are "necessary" for his departure, and to whom he must apply for them. He observed that "aliens living in this country are not necessarily sophisticated world travelers familiar with the present-day red tape that must be unwound to get from one country to another." Justice Jackson, with whom Justice Frankfurter agreed, maintained that the statute was unconstitutional on its face, within the rule of the Wong Wing case,²⁹ which held that punishment for unlawful residence by an alien cannot be had without a judicial trial. Here the statute does not permit the court which tries the alien for the crime of unlawful residence to pass on the illegality of his presence. Thus the mere production of an administrative order for deportation becomes conclusive evidence of unlawful presence, without the possibility of judicial inquiry into the order's validity. It is true, said Justice Jackson, that the alien has no constitutional protection against administrative deportation, but he stands on an equal footing with the citizen when he is charged with crime. The Court majority had refused to deal with this issue because it hadn't been briefed or argued. Said Justice Jackson: "I abstain from comment on this new squeamishness whereby the Court imprisons itself within counsel's argument." At the very least, he said, the Court could order the case reargued.

Alien Property. An enemy alien's claim to property vested by the Alien Property Custodian had better luck in Guessefeldt v. McGrath,³⁰ decided by a five-to-three vote. The appellant, a German citizen who lived in Hawaii continuously from 1896 to 1938, took his family to Germany for a vacation in 1938 and was kept there involuntarily until 1949. He alleged he had done nothing to aid the enemy's war effort. The Court agreed with his contention that he was not "resident within" Germany within the meaning of the definition of "enemy" in the Trading with the Enemy Act, and that he could therefore sue the Custodian. The debatable point was whether Section 39, forbidding the return of property to any "national" of Germany or Japan, applied to Guessefeldt. Justice Frankfurter held that as a matter of legislative history and purpose, this section did not apply to this party, and that if it did, it would raise "debatable constitutional questions." His theory was that friendly aliens are protected by the Fifth Amendment requirement of just compensation.³¹ He agreed that there were contrary views, but insisted that in any event "the constitutional problem is not imaginary." Of course, he did no more than argue the desirability of deciding the case without answering the constitutional question. In his dissent, Chief Justice Vinson said that plainly Guessefeldt was an enemy alien in every ordinary sense of the term, and "there is no constitutional prohibition against confiscation of enemy properties."³²

Denaturalization. Finally, in *Bindczyck v. Finucane*³³ the Court held that the denaturalization procedure spelled out in the Nationality Act—which requires the United States district attorney to file an affidavit showing good cause, and gives the individual concerned sixty days' personal notice to answer the petition—was the exclusive procedure for revoking citizenship on account of fraudulent or illegal procurement based on evidence outside the record. Bindczyck was naturalized in a Maryland state court in 1943, and then seven days later, at the same term of court, and in accordance with its power under local law to set aside judgments during the term in which they were rendered, the court set aside the order of naturalization on motion of the government. Speaking for a majority of five, Justice Frankfurter pointed out that the denaturalization section of the Nationality Act, adopted in 1906, was the result of a half-century of agitation designed to avoid the evils of haphazard denaturalization.³⁴ Congress intended to formulate "a self-contained, exclusive procedure," and did not intend to leave the matter to the confused medley of state procedures for setting aside local judgments. For errors on the record, the United States may appeal, in accordance with the rule of the Tutun case.³⁵ For errors outside the record, the statutory denaturalization procedure is provided. Justice Frankfurter rejected the contention that a grant of citizenship is a judgment which, like any judgment, is within the control of the issuing court during the term. "Such abstract reasoning is mechanical jurisprudence in its most glittering form," and disregards both the purpose of the statute and "the capricious and haphazard results that would flow from applying such an empty syllogism to the actualities of judicial administration." The dissenting Justices, Reed and Burton, thought that Congress clearly gave state courts concurrent jurisdiction over the matter, and that as a matter of course the states are free to exercise the grant of power in accordance with their normal procedures, unless specifically forbidden to do so by the federal legislation.

Bail. While the Court ruled that aliens held for deportation may, in the discretion of the Attorney General, be denied bail altogether, a unanimous Court construed the meaning of the Eighth Amendment's interdiction of "excessive" bail favorably to the petitioners in Stack v. Boyle.³⁶ Twelve persons had been indicted in the federal District Court, Southern District of California, for conspiracy to violate the Smith Act. On arrest, bail was fixed at $50,000 each. The only evidence offered by the government in opposition to a motion to reduce bail was that four persons previously convicted under the Smith Act in the southern district of New York had forfeited bail. After the District Court refused to reduce bail, the petitioners filed applications for writs of habeas corpus in the same court. The writs were denied, the Court of Appeals affirmed, and the Supreme Court granted certiorari. While the holding was that the bail was excessive, the Court ruled that the proper procedure for challenging bail is by motion to reduce, and then appeal to the Court of Appeals from an order denying the motion. Habeas corpus should be withheld where an adequate remedy available in the criminal proceeding has not been exhausted. Therefore, the judgment of the Court of Appeals was vacated, and the case was remanded to the District Court with direction to hold a hearing on the question of excessive bail.

As to the substantive issue, Chief Justice Vinson asserted that since 1789, "federal law has unequivocally provided that a person arrested for a non-capital offense shall be admitted to bail. This traditional right to freedom before conviction permits the unhampered preparation of a defense, and serves to prevent the infliction of punishment prior to conviction. . . . Unless this right to bail before trial is preserved, the presumption of innocence, secured only after centuries of struggle, would lose its meaning." A defendant must provide bail in order to give adequate assurance that he will stand trial and submit to sentence if convicted. Bail is "excessive" under the Eighth Amendment if the figure is higher than an amount reasonably calculated to fulfil this purpose.³⁷ This is the directive of the applicable federal rule of criminal procedure.³⁸ The bail fixed in this case, the Chief Justice noted, was higher than that usually imposed for offenses with like penalties.³⁹ And it cannot be assumed, without evidence, that each petitioner is a pawn in the hands of a superior. He said: "To infer from the fact of indictment alone a need for bail in an unusually high amount is an arbitrary act. Such conduct would inject into our system of government the very principles of totalitarianism which Congress was seeking to guard against in passing the statute under which petitioners have been indicted." If higher than usual bail is required, it must be supported by evidence brought out in a hearing.

Searches and Seizures. On Lee operated a laundry in Hoboken. Poy, an old acquaintance and former employee, came in to his place of business and engaged him in conversation, during which On Lee made incriminating statements which led to his conviction on an opium charge. He did not know that Poy was an undercover agent for the Bureau of Narcotics, nor did he know that Poy was wired for sound, with a small microphone in his pocket and a small antenna running along his arm. Nor did he know that an agent of the Bureau, Lawrence Lee, was stationed outside with a receiving set. On Lee could be seen through the large front window, and agent Lee could hear the conversation. It was conceded that agent Lee's testimony was prejudicial. A majority of five Justices rejected On Lee's claim that the admission of agent Lee's testimony violated the search and seizure clause of the Fourth Amendment, Section 605 of the Federal Communications Act, and the principles of fair play.⁴⁰ Four Justices voted to reverse.

³⁸ Rule 46(c). "AMOUNT. If the defendant is admitted to bail, the amount thereof shall be such as in the judgment of the commissioner or court or judge or justice will insure the presence of the defendant, having regard to the nature and circumstances of the offense charged, the weight of the evidence against him, the financial ability of the defendant to give bail and the character of the defendant."

⁴⁰ On Lee v. United States, 348 U.S. 747 (1952). See Alan F. Westin, "The Wire-Tapping Problem: An Analysis and a Legislative Proposal," Columbia Law Review, Vol. 52, pp. 165-208 (1952); Osmond K. Fraenkel, "The Fourth Amendment and the Federal Courts," Lawyers Guild Review, Vol. 12, pp. 73-77 (1952); Leon R. Yankwich, "The Right of Privacy: Its Development, Scope and Limitations," Notre Dame Lawyer, Vol. 27, pp. 499-528 (1952); William S. Fairfield and Charles Clift, "The Wiretappers," The Reporter, Vol. 7, December 23, 1952, pp. 8-22; Vol. 8, January 6, 1953, pp. 9-20.

For the majority, Justice Jackson held that there had been no unlawful search and seizure because, since Poy entered the place of business with On Lee's consent, if not by an implied invitation, no trespass had been committed. He ruled that Poy's subsequent conduct did not vitiate the consent and render the entry a trespass ab initio.⁴¹ The contention that Poy's entrance was a trespass because consent to enter was obtained by fraud was rejected as a "fine-spun" doctrine, and the suggestion that agent Lee, outside the laundry, was a trespasser "verges on the frivolous." The cases dealing with unlawful seizure of tangible property, Justice Jackson held, do not apply in the field of mechanical or electronic devices, at least where access to the listening post was not obtained by unlawful search. The Court refused to reconsider the Olmstead case,⁴² which held wiretapping to be outside the ban of the Fourth Amendment. But it would do On Lee no good, said Justice Jackson, even if the Olmstead decision were overruled, because there is no analogy between wiretapping and what transpired here. Eavesdropping outside an open window, or use of field glasses to magnify vision, are not forbidden, and they would have no more effect on the petitioner's privacy. Similarly, Section 605 of the Federal Communications Act was not violated because On Lee had no communications facility to be interfered with.

Finally, Justice Jackson rejected the plea that the evidence should be excluded in order to discipline federal law enforcement officers, within the rule of the McNabb case.⁴³ Here neither the agent nor the informer had violated any federal law. Furthermore, the general rule of common law is that otherwise admissible evidence is not rendered inadmissible by the fact of having been obtained illegally, and departure from this rule must be justified by some compelling social policy. "Society," said Justice Jackson, "can ill afford to throw away the evidence produced by the falling out, jealousies, and quarrels of those who live by outwitting the law." In fact, he asserted, the recent trend of the law is in favor of admitting testimony, leaving its weight up to the trier of fact. He did not believe that the government should "be arbitrarily penalized for the low morals of its informers."⁴⁴

Justice Frankfurter thought the majority was adopting the doctrine that

⁴² Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928). Said Chief Justice Taft: "There was no searching. There was no seizure. The evidence was secured by the use of the sense of hearing and that only. There was no entry. . . ." Justice Holmes said in dissent: ". . . For my part I think it a less evil that some criminals should escape than that the government should play an ignoble part. . . ." Said Justice Brandeis, dissenting also: "Crime is contagious. If the government becomes a law-breaker, it breeds contempt for law. . . ."

⁴⁴ See Richard C. Donnelly, "Judicial Control of Informants, Spies, Stool Pigeons, and Agent Provocateurs," Yale Law Journal, Vol. 60, pp. 1091-1131 (1951).

the end justifies reprehensible means. He conceded that a criminal prosecution is more than a game, but insisted that it is not a dirty game. He argued that the Olmstead decision was a mistake, and should be overruled for the reasons originally given by the four dissenting Justices—Holmes, Brandeis, Butler and Stone—who were not sentimentalists about criminals, “no softies.” The Court’s rule is a bad one, Justice Frankfurter stated, because it “makes for lazy and not alert law enforcement. It puts a premium on force and fraud, not on imagination and enterprise and professional training.”

A much simpler problem was resolved in United States v. Jeffers.⁴⁵ Here officers entered the hotel room of the defendant’s two aunts, in their absence and his, and without warrant searched the place and seized narcotics claimed by the defendant. The Court ruled that the motion to exclude the evidence should have been granted. The fact that the evidence was not on the defendant’s premises did not deprive him of standing to suppress it. The search cannot be separated from the seizure. The Court, said Justice Clark, will not permit “a quibbling distinction to overturn a principle which was designed to protect a fundamental right.”

Illegal Detention. In the recent McNabb and Upshaw cases,⁴⁶ the Court laid down the rule that confessions should be excluded if obtained during a period of illegal detention, due to failure to bring the defendant promptly before a committing magistrate. In *United States v. Carignan*⁴⁷ the Court declined to extend the rule. Carignan was arrested in Anchorage, Alaska, on an assault charge, on a Friday, and while in lawful custody on that charge was questioned the following Saturday and Monday about a murder. He finally confessed, after being permitted to consult a priest twice. There was no evidence of violence, persistent questioning, denial of food or rest, or promises. The conviction was reversed on another ground, that error was committed when the trial court refused to permit the defendant to testify in the absence of the jury on the question of the voluntariness of the confession. But on the detention issue the Court ruled that, absent coercion, threats or inducements, the Constitution does not forbid police examination in private of those in lawful custody, and that since Carignan was lawfully detained, his case fell outside the reason of the McNabb rule, which was to abolish unlawful detention. The exclusion of involuntary confessions, said Justice Reed, gives an accused complete protection, and it would not promote justice to extend a mechanical rule based on the time of a confession. Three concurring Justices agreed that the conviction was properly set aside, but for the reason that the police should not be permitted the practice of arresting a man on one charge in order to investigate a wholly (and usually) different crime. Said Justice Douglas: “The rule of evidence we announce today gives sanction to the police practice which makes detention the means of investigation. Therein lies its vice.”

Habeas Corpus. In Section 2255 of the 1948 revision of the Judicial Code, Congress provided that prisoners in custody under sentence of a federal court, claiming the right to be released because of a violation of the Constitution or laws, or because the court lacked jurisdiction, or because the sentence was in excess of the authorized maximum, or is otherwise subject to collateral attack, may move the court which imposed sentence to vacate or correct the sentence. Such a motion for relief may be made at any time, and in its discretion the court may act ex parte. The sentencing court is not required to entertain a second motion for similar relief, and appeal lies to the court of appeals. The statute also provides that an application for a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of a prisoner who is authorized to apply for relief by motion shall not be entertained if it appears that the petitioner has failed to seek relief by motion to the sentencing court, unless the remedy by motion is inadequate or ineffective to test the legality of the detention. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit thought that in precluding resort to habeas corpus Section 2255 unconstitutionally suspended the writ. Since a habeas corpus action must be brought in the district of confinement, two important consequences followed which the new rule sought to correct. First, the habeas corpus hearing had to be held in a court in which the records are not readily available; and secondly, the few district courts in whose jurisdiction the major federal penitentiaries are located were required to handle unusually large numbers of petitions, often far from the scene of the facts, the witnesses and the records. Accordingly, after extensive consideration, the Judicial Conference of the United States recommended the change in procedure, to permit collateral attack on convictions in the sentencing courts. The new remedy is in fact in the nature of the ancient writ of error coram nobis. The Court ruled unanimously that there was no impingement upon prisoners' rights of collateral attack upon convictions, and that the sole purpose of Section 2255 was "to minimize the difficulties encountered in habeas corpus hearings by affording the same rights in another and more convenient forum."⁴⁸ But actually the Court refused to rule directly on the constitutionality of the statute on the ground that, since the district court had not followed the procedure outlined in the statute, no constitutional question was properly before the Court.

The Rule of Definiteness. A federal statute making it a crime for anyone to solicit or receive contributions in consideration of a promise to support or use influence in obtaining for any person "any appointive office or place under the United States" was sustained by a five-to-four vote in a case where the office in question, while authorized by an act of Congress, was not yet in actual existence.⁴⁹ The majority thought the statute plainly reached "dealing in futures," as to offices which might "reasonably be expected" to be established, for "it is no less corrupt to sell an office one may never be able to deliver than to sell one he can." This construction does not run afoul of the requirement of definiteness, for "the sale of non-existent but plausible offices" is not likely to entrap the influence merchant. The four dissenters thought the statute applied only to actual existing offices, and stressed that this "reasonably to be expected" office hadn't as yet been set up.

In another case,⁵⁰ the Court upheld, by a six-to-three vote, a regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission which provided that "drivers of motor vehicles transporting any explosive, inflammable liquid, inflammable compressed gas, or poisonous gas shall avoid, so far as practicable, and, where feasible, by prearrangement of routes, driving into or through congested thoroughfares, places where crowds are assembled, street car tracks, tunnels, viaducts and dangerous crossings." (Italics added.) The District Court held that the words "so far as practicable, and, where feasible," were too vague and indefinite as a standard of guilt. The Supreme Court disagreed, pointing out that "few words possess the precision of mathematical symbols, most statutes must deal with untold and unforeseen variations in factual situations, and the practical necessities of discharging the business of government inevitably limit the specificity with which legislators can spell out prohibitions. Consequently, no more than a reasonable degree of certainty can be demanded." It was pointed out that in the Sproles case⁵¹ Chief Justice Hughes held the term "shortest practicable route" not to be too vague. The Court noted that the I.C.C. rule was the product of a long history of regulation and study in which the trucking industry participated extensively. Finally, attention was drawn to the fact that the statute punished only those who knowingly violate the regulation, which does much to destroy any force in the argument that the statute was unfair.⁵² The three dissenters felt that the regulation was unworkable and indefinite—that where Congress delegates the crime-making power to an administrative commission, a considerable precision is required.

Fair Compensation. The Alien Property Custodian brought suit to require the Cities Service Company to pay on two debentures; the obligations represented by them had previously been vested under the Trading with the Enemy Act upon a finding that they were owned by a resident and national of Germany. The Custodian never had possession of the debentures. One matured in 1950, but had never been presented for payment, and was last reported to be in Berlin in the hands of the Russians. The other matures in 1969, and was presented in 1950 to Chase National, the indenture trustee, for redemption, and is now in the possession of a New York brokerage house. The Court held that the statute grants the authority to vest obligations evidenced by domestic negotiable bearer debentures, even though the debentures themselves were outside the United States.⁵³ The Court rejected the fiction that, since the debentures were located outside the country at the time of vesting, the debts did not have a situs within the United States for purposes of seizure. This would provide a sanctuary for enemy investments, defeat the recovery of American securities looted by conquering forces, and restrict the exercise of the war powers of the United States. Since the obligor was in the country, and the obligation can be effectively dealt with through the exercise of jurisdiction over the obligor, Congress transgressed no constitutional limitations.

The more serious issue, however, was whether the Act took the Company's property contrary to the Fifth Amendment unless it has a remedy against the United States in case a foreign court holds it liable to a holder in due course of the debentures. It was conceded that the Act discharges the obligor of all liability in any American court, but it owns extensive properties all over the world which subject it to foreign suits. The Court agreed that it was possible that Cities Service might suffer judgment in a foreign country, and in the event of double recovery it would have a right to recoup from the United States for a "taking" of its property without just compensation. Only with this assurance against double liability can it be fairly said that the present seizure is not itself an unconstitutional taking of property. Two Justices thought that the determination of the obligation of the United States, in the event that the Company is required to pay another claimant, should not be made until a second judgment is had.

Treason. Kawakita was born in the United States in 1921 of Japanese nationals, and hence was a citizen of both countries. In 1939, shortly before he became 18, he went to Japan for a visit, with an American passport, to obtain which he took the usual oath of allegiance. In 1940 he registered with an American consul in Japan as an American citizen. He remained there, entered a university in 1941, and once more renewed his passport and took the oath. In 1943, he registered in a family census register, and got a job as interpreter with a nickel company. At this time he had his name removed as an alien and changed his address from California to Japan. Later he went to China on a Japanese passport and accepted labor draft papers from the Japanese government. Hired to interpret for prisoners of war working for the nickel company, his treasonable acts consisted in mistreating them. In December, 1945, Kawakita went to the American consul at Yokohama and registered as an American citizen, stating under oath that he was a United States citizen and that he had not done various acts amounting to expatriation. He was issued a passport and returned to the United States. Soon after that he was recognized, arrested, and convicted of treason. The trial judge charged the jury that if Kawakita had lost his American citizenship he must be acquitted, but if he remained an American citizen then he owed the same duty of allegiance as any other citizen, and that even if he was an American citizen, he must be acquitted if he honestly believed that he was no longer a citizen, for in that event he could not have had the necessary treasonable intent. The Supreme Court, by a four-to-three vote, affirmed the conviction.⁵⁴

⁵⁴ Kawakita v. United States, 343 U.S. 717 (1952).

The Court held, in the first place, that Kawakita had not expatriated himself, and that since the implications of his acts were ambiguous, it was for the jury to decide. Justice Douglas noted that Kawakita had held no "office, post or employment" under the Japanese government, which would be proof of denaturalization, and that the company he worked for was a private institution organized for profit. The Court also rejected the contention that a person with dual nationality can be guilty of treason only to the country where he resides. Neither the Treason Clause of the Constitution nor the Treason Act of 1790 has a territorial limitation. It is not true that an American citizen living beyond the territorial limits of the United States may not commit treason against the United States. American citizenship, until lost, carries obligations of allegiance as well as privileges and benefits. A person with dual citizenship, who happens to be in the other country when war breaks out, may choose one or the other, but he may also elect to continue his dual citizenship. The dual citizen may owe paramount allegiance to the other country while there, but this does not mean that he therefore owes no allegiance to the United States. Certain acts which are done voluntarily or wilfully might be treasonable, even though they would not be such if done under compulsion of law or the job. Here the jury found that Kawakita had not been forced to commit the traitorous acts. He cannot say that being a citizen of Japan he owed no allegiance to the United States even though he was an American citizen.

The ingredients of treason are adhering to the enemy, giving him aid and comfort. Disloyal thoughts are not enough; there must be proof of overt acts. The jury found Kawakita guilty of eight overt acts; one would have sufficed. Some of the acts consisted in mistreating American prisoners to get more work out of them. Though Kawakita's contribution to the Japanese war effort was minor, yet it was treasonable, the important thing being the nature of the act. The act may even be unnecessary to the success of the enemy, or only abortive. The test is whether it gives aid and comfort to the enemy, at the moment of its performance. The other acts of cruelty to American prisoners were not required by Kawakita's job as interpreter. And it is immaterial that what he did was lawful under Japanese law; the source of the law of treason is the American Constitution. Finally, the Court held that the two-witness rule for each overt act is met even though the witnesses differ in details. While two witnesses must testify to the same act, it isn't necessary that their testimony be identical.

Chief Justice Vinson and Justices Black and Burton dissented because they believed that Kawakita had expatriated himself by virtue of his various activities in Japan, including the heinous treatment of American prisoners of war.

Discrimination. While not involving a direct interpretation of the Constitution, *Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v. Howard*⁵⁵ is worth noting as an additional step forward in the war against discrimination in employment. On threat of a strike, the union, bargaining representative for the brakemen under the Railway Labor Act, forced the Frisco railroad to agree to discharge all colored "train porters," who actually performed all the duties of white brakemen. The Negroes had their own union. By a six-to-three vote the Court held the agreement to exclude the Negroes from employment illegal, following the rule of the Steele case,⁵⁶ although in Steele the Negroes had no union of their own and the Brotherhood was the exclusive bargaining agent for the entire craft (of firemen). Justice Black ruled that the breach of statutory duty was the same in both cases, the illegality consisting in racial discrimination, which Congress did not authorize. The federal act, said the Justice, prohibits bargaining agents from using their power to destroy the jobs of colored workers in order to give them to white workers. Three Justices dissented on the ground that Steele was not controlling because, since the Negroes had their own union in the instant case, the Brotherhood had no duty to contract for them. While neither a state government nor the federal government may discriminate on the ground of race, private parties may, and no applicable federal law says they may not. They asserted that it was up to Congress to write a fair employment practices act, and is not the province of the Court to do so.

Federal Protection of Civil Rights. The Court's war of attrition against the surviving remnants of the post-Civil War civil rights acts⁵⁷ continued with Stefanelli v. Minard.⁵⁸ Newark police officers entered petitioner's home without legal authority and seized property dealing with bookmaking. It was not disputed that if federal officers had made this search, they would have violated the Fourth Amendment. Following his indictment, Stefanelli made no move in the state court to suppress the evidence, since under New Jersey law the seized property is admissible. He therefore sued for an injunction in a federal District Court against the use of the evidence on the basis of a federal statute which authorizes any person who is deprived by anyone acting under color of local law of any right or privilege secured by the Constitution and laws of the United States, to sue at law or in equity or in any other proper proceeding. The Court sustained a dismissal of the suit by the trial court. Justice Frankfurter reminded that the recent Wolf case⁵⁹ held that in a prosecution in a state court for a state crime, the Fourteenth Amendment does not forbid the admission of evidence secured by an unreasonable search and seizure although due process embraces the search and seizure problems.⁶⁰ He refused to decide whether the complaint stated a cause of action under the federal statute, because the balance was against a federal court of equity using its discretion in favor of the petitioner. "The maxim that equity will not enjoin a criminal prosecution summarizes centuries of weighty experience in Anglo-American law. It is impressively reinforced when not merely the relations between coordinate courts but between coordinate political authorities are at issue." Federal courts should therefore not interfere piecemeal to try collateral issues arising in pending state criminal cases, there being too much danger of "insupportable disruption."

⁶⁰ Justice Douglas, dissenting alone, noted that he had dissented, along with Justices Murphy and Rutledge, in the Wolf case. He said: "To hold first that the evidence may be admitted and second that its use may not be enjoined is to make the Fourth Amendment an empty and hollow guarantee so far as state prosecutions are concerned."

3. THE FEDERAL TAXING POWER

An interesting controversy over federal taxation was resolved by a five-to-four vote of the Court in Rutkin v. United States.⁶¹ The issue was whether money obtained by extortion was income taxable to the extortioner. The Internal Revenue Code, Section 22(a), covers "gains or profits and income derived from any source whatever." The jury found that $250,000 which petitioner had received from a former partner was obtained by extortion. In support of his argument that this was not taxable income Rutkin relied upon the recent Wilcox case,⁶² which held that embezzled funds were not taxable income to the embezzler because he had no rightful claim to the money and was under legal obligation to return it. Speaking for a bare majority of the Court, Justice Burton rather lamely "limited the Wilcox case to its facts"; that is to say, he didn't overrule its holding nor did he applaud it. He said merely that embezzling is not extortion, which is technically true, but which ignores the fact that analogy is the life of the law. It is established, he argued, that an unlawful gain, as well as a lawful one, constitutes taxable income when its recipient has such control over it that as a practical matter he derives readily realizable economic value from it. This accords with settled administrative and judicial rule and practice. The original 1913 income tax act, it was pointed out, taxed incomes from any "lawful" business, but in 1916 an amendment deleted the word "lawful" with the obvious intent of taxing unlawful gains as well. The broad language of Section 22(a) shows that Congress intended to exercise its full power to tax income.

The four dissenters thought the Wilcox case was controlling, an extortioner having no better claim to his money than an embezzler. Justice Black noted that Justice Burton had dissented in Wilcox, and said that actually the Court was now adopting, as a result largely of a change in its personnel, the reasoning which had previously been rejected. Justice Black agreed that income derived from such enterprises as gambling and bootlegging are taxable though illegal, because those so engaged have a bona fide claim to their money. But he insisted that Congress did not intend to treat the sporadic loot of an embezzler or extortioner or robber as belonging to them.

Above all, Justice Black severely criticized this effort on the part of the national government to punish such purely local crimes as embezzlement and extortion. He maintained that this expansion of the federal criminal jurisdiction into fields of law enforcement heretofore left wholly to the state and local communities was unwise for all concerned. Many think it lowers the prestige of the federal system of justice, and tends to make it top-heavy, but above all the United States cannot do its own job properly if it expands into the state criminal law field. This development is also bad for the states because the elements of these offenses and their underlying problems vary from state to state, because it weakens the sense of local responsibility for local conditions, and weakens control by state courts over interpretation of their own state laws. It also imperils the possibility of fair trials because of the danger of double or even triple prosecutions. Finally, such prosecutions are always prejudicial to the defendant, because of the resulting confusion of issues, as in this case, where Rutkin was hardly tried for tax evasion. Of some 900 pages of printed testimony only 13 related to tax questions.

4. THE COMMERCE POWER

While there were quite a number of cases during the 1951 Term in the commerce field, few involved interpretations of the basic constitutional scope of the power of Congress. Perhaps the most interesting was the case of the Lorain Journal,⁶³ in which this Ohio newspaper was enjoined under the Sherman Act because, as the only newspaper in town, it refused to take advertising from anyone who patronized a competing radio station. A unanimous Court found that the conduct complained of was an attempt to monopolize interstate commerce. "There can be little doubt today," said Justice Burton, "that the immediate dissemination of news gathered from throughout the nation or the world by agencies specially organized for that purpose is a part of interstate commerce. . . . The same is true of national advertising originating throughout the nation and offering products for sale on a national scale." The distribution of news and advertising transmitted to Lorain in interstate commerce was regarded as an inseparable part of the flow of interstate commerce. "Without the protection of competition at the outlets of the flow of interstate commerce, the protection of its earlier stages is of little worth."

Similarly, the Court ruled that a company which grants patent licenses embodying price-fixing agreements was in commerce, and subject to the Sherman Act, even though it manufactured nothing, but was merely the owner of the patents, granting the right of making and vending to others.⁶⁴ "We think it beyond question," said Justice Reed, "that this making of license contracts for the purpose of regulating distribution and fixing prices of commodities in interstate commerce is subject to the Sherman Act, even though the isolated act of contracting for the licenses is wholly within a single state." In another case the Court held that a power company with its plants on the Susquehanna River in Pennsylvania, which sells to a Baltimore company when the river flow permits and buys from it during periods of low flow, is in interstate commerce and therefore subject to regulation as to rates and service by the Federal Power Commission.⁶⁵ The Commission's authority to regulate this commingled flow of power is complete, and does not vary with the rise and fall of the river. The Court also affirmed per curiam and without opinion an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission increasing intrastate commuters' fares on the New Haven Railroad to the level of interstate rates.⁶⁶ On the other hand, the furnishing of prepaid medical care on a local plane, with no showing that any across-the-state-line activities were adversely affected, and with only a few sporadic and incidental payments to out-of-state doctors and hospitals, was held to be outside the scope of interstate commerce and therefore of the Sherman Act.⁶⁷

5. FEDERAL JUDICIAL POWER

Contempt Power. One of the by-products of the turbulent, marathon trial of the eleven Communist leaders which came to a close in 1951 with the Dennis decision⁶⁸ was the Court's approval by a six-to-three vote of Judge Medina's sentencing of the lawyers to jail for periods up to six months, after the jury's verdict was in, without giving further notice or a hearing.⁶⁹ Certiorari had been limited to the question whether the judge had properly followed the relevant Rule. Rule 42(a) provides that a criminal contempt may be punished sum-

⁶⁶ New York v. United States, 342 U.S. 882 (1951). Justice Douglas dissented on the ground that the ICC hadn't supplied an adequate basis for its decision, since all it did, so he argued, was to make findings that the interstate rates were reasonable, and then fix the intrastate rates at the same level. It made no findings as to what would constitute a fair proportion of the railroad's total income for intrastate traffic; there was no finding as to the necessary relation between interstate and intrastate commutation rates. He warned against over-reliance upon expertise; it is "the strength of modern government," but it "can become a monster which rules with no practical limits on its discretion."

⁶⁷ United States v. Oregon State Medical Society, 343 U.S. 326 (1952). It was pointed out that American Medical Association v. United States, 317 U.S. 519 (1943) involved a conspiracy in the District of Columbia, and therefore presented no commerce issue. Three important cases in the commerce field not involving questions of constitutional law were: Federal Trade Commission v. Ruberoid Co., 343 U.S. 470 (1952), which approved a new approach of the Commission to the problem of curbing price discrimination under the Robinson-Patman Act; Brannan v. Stark, 342 U.S. 451 (1952), in which, by a four-to-three vote, the Court expressed disapproval of an order of the Secretary of Agriculture, under the Agricultural Marketing Agreement Act, relating to the marketing of milk in the Boston area by cooperative marketing associations; National Labor Relations Board v. American National Insurance Co., 343 U.S. 395 (1952), where by a six-to-three vote the inclusion of "management functions" clauses in bargaining agreements was held to be within the terms of the Taft-Hartley Act.

⁶⁸ Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951).

marily if the judge certifies that he saw or heard the conduct constituting the contempt and it was committed in his actual presence. Rule 42(b) states that otherwise criminal contempts shall be prosecuted on notice; reasonable time must be allowed to prepare a defense; the defendant is entitled to trial by jury in any case in which an act of Congress so provides; and if the contempt involves disrespect of the judge, he is disqualified from presiding at the hearing except with the defendant's consent. The lawyers who were held in contempt maintained that Judge Medina could have proceeded summarily if he had acted at once upon the occurrence of each incident; but that since he waited till the end of the trial, punishment would no longer have anything to do with any obstruction of the trial. They maintained that they were entitled to a jury trial before another judge under Rule 42(b).

Justice Jackson, speaking for the majority, made no direct mention of any constitutional issue. He said there were good practical reasons why a judge should have a summary contempt power, to protect the integrity of the judicial process, but that "summary" does not refer to the timing of the action in reference to the offense, but rather to a procedure which dispenses with formality. He could find no prejudice to these lawyers if the judge waited till the end of the trial, if their conduct warranted immediate summary punishment. "The overriding consideration is the integrity and efficiency of the trial process, and if the judge deems immediate action inexpedient he should be allowed discretion to follow the procedure taken in this case." In fact, to summon a lawyer and pronounce him guilty during the trial might prejudice the client by denying him counsel and give grounds for demanding a new trial. Furthermore, Justice Jackson thought it might be better for the lawyer if the judge waits till he cools off. Though he thought most judges reliable, he conceded that the contempt power may be abused, but if that happens appeal lies to the court of appeals and to this Court. He served notice that this Court "will unhesitatingly protect counsel in fearless, vigorous and effective performance of every duty pertaining to the office of the advocate on behalf of any person whatsoever. But it will not equate contempt with courage or insults with independence. It will also protect the processes of orderly trial, which is the supreme object of the lawyer's calling."

Justice Black dissented vigorously. He thought the record showed that the judge had been so bitterly hostile to these lawyers that he was disqualified to try them. "No man," he asserted, "should be forced to trial before a judge who has previously publicly attacked his personal honor and integrity. The risk to impartial justice is too great." Justice Black thought these men had been denied the constitutional rights to indictment by grand jury and trial by jury. The Court had previously reduced the contempt power to "the least possible power adequate to the ends proposed," the ends being decorum and obedience to orders.⁷⁰ Furthermore, he argued that there was no need for summary conviction because the trial was over and the danger of obstructing it had passed.

Indeed, trial by jury was all the more necessary because the alleged offenses related to conduct that affronted the judge personally. Nor could Justice Black find much reassurance in the fact that lawyer-judges are available to review contempt citations, arguing that the constitutional guarantee of trial by jury is based on a preference for a trial by laymen.

Justice Frankfurter thought that the judge's accusations were too personal for him to act as both accuser and judge, and that it was established that no judge should sit in a case in which he is personally involved.⁷¹ He also thought that Judge Medina had not been entirely without fault himself. Justice Douglas agreed that it would be difficult to decide who had behaved worse, the judge or the lawyers, and that no one was without blame. He also agreed with Justice Black that the defendants were entitled to trial by jury.

Fair Procedure. The decree of a federal District Court in a civil action under the Sherman Act required the issuance of patent licenses on a fair royalty basis. To fix reasonable royalty rates the Court directed the government and the offending company each to select two arbitrators, with these four choosing a fifth person in case of a stalemate. If agreement could not be had on the fifth man, then the trial judge would appoint someone or sit himself. In this instance he served as the crucial member of the committee himself. The company argued that the royalties must be determined in judicial proceedings based on hearing and evidence. The Supreme Court disagreed, pointing out that it was always within the power of the trial judge to establish the royalty rates.⁷² It was not mandatory for the judge to hold a full hearing or refer the royalty matter to a master. While the judge's procedure was an innovation, Justice Jackson asserted that "novelty is not synonymous with error." There was no abuse here in the discretion which a trial judge has in framing relief in anti-trust cases.

Military Justice. In Madsen v. Kinsella,⁷³ the Court held that in the absence of statutory limitations, the President as commander-in-chief may establish a U.S. Court of the Allied High Commission for Germany and authorize it to try a civilian citizen of the United States and dependent wife of a member of the Armed Forces, on a homicide charge. It was conceded that a regularly convened general court-martial would have had jurisdiction. The Court ruled that "since our nation's earliest days, such [military] commissions have been constitutionally recognized agencies for meeting many urgent governmental responsibilities related to war." These "common-law war courts" have taken many forms and names, without statutory prescription. The President's authority in this respect survives the end of hostilities. "The President," said Justice Burton, "has the urgent and infinite responsibility not only of combating the enemy but of governing any territory occupied by the United States by force of arms." Congress may legislate on this subject as it chooses, but when the Articles of War were revised in 1916 by extending the jurisdiction of courts-martial to include civilian offenders, an express reservation was made for military commissions. That the occupation courts were military commissions, the crucial issue, was assumed without proof or argument. Justice Black dissented alone, arguing that all legislative power is vested by the Constitution in Congress, and that the President is not specifically authorized to create courts to try American citizens.

Judicial Review of Administrative Decisions. A standard clause in government contracts provides that all disputes involving questions of fact shall be decided by the contracting officer, with the right of appeal to the head of the department "whose decision shall be final and conclusive upon the parties thereto." The Court ruled that a finding by the head of the department on a question of fact may not be set aside by the Court of Claims unless it was founded on fraud, and that by fraud is meant conscious wrong-doing, with an intention to cheat or be dishonest.⁷⁴ It follows that a finding by the Court of Claims that the decision of the department head was "arbitrary," "capricious" and "grossly erroneous" is not sufficient to justify setting it aside. Three Justices dissented. Justice Douglas filed a very strong statement on the subject of administrative absolutism. He said the Court's rule in this case "makes a tyrant of every contracting officer."

Eleventh Amendment. The Georgia Railroad & Banking Company was chartered in 1833 by a special act which included exemption from taxation. In 1945 the Georgia Constitution was amended to include a provision declaring null and void "all exemptions from taxation heretofore granted in corporate charters." When the State Revenue Commissioner threatened to proceed against it for the collection of ad valorem taxes, the company filed suit in the state court for an injunction and a declaratory judgment, but the Georgia Supreme Court ruled this was an unconsented suit against the state,⁷⁵ and the U.S. Supreme Court dismissed an appeal on the ground that the judgment was based upon an adequate nonfederal ground.⁷⁶ Thereupon the company filed an action in the federal District Court for injunctive relief, and a three-judge court dismissed on the ground that it was an unconsented suit against the state contrary to the Eleventh Amendment. The Supreme Court disagreed unanimously, and remanded the case for a trial on the merits.⁷⁷ Chief Justice Vinson ruled that the action was not one to enforce an alleged contract with Georgia, as the court below supposed, but rather a suit to enjoin the collection of taxes in violation of federal constitutional rights. "This Court has long held," the Chief Justice asserted, "that a suit to restrain unconstitutional action threatened by an individual who is a state officer is not a suit against the State." This position was reexamined in the Young case,⁷⁸ and has been consistently followed. The rule is that the immunity of the state from judicial interference

"does not extend to individuals who act as officers without constitutional authority."

Relations with State Courts. There were during the Term under review the usual cases dealing with the relations between state and federal courts. We were reminded once more that where the highest state court delivers no opinion and it appears that its judgment might have rested upon a nonfederal ground, the Supreme Court will not take jurisdiction to review the judgment.⁷⁹ One case was continued to enable petitioner's counsel to secure a determination in the state supreme court as to whether its judgment was intended to rest on an adequate independent state ground,⁸⁰ and later on the Court refused to regard a letter from the clerk of the state court, not apparently a part of the record, as a sufficient "determination."⁸¹ In another instance, the case was continued to enable the petitioner to secure, in an appropriate state proceeding, a determination as to the effect upon the appeal of the repeal of the state statute the constitutionality of which was drawn in question by the appeal.⁸² Finally, in another phase of the seemingly endless merry-go-round⁸³ of Illinois procedure, the Court remanded a case to the state's highest court for a determination of the adequacy of the state remedy for the protection of federal constitutional rights alleged to have been infringed in the course of trials.⁸⁴ The Court felt that it could not proceed until the state court had construed the meaning of the Illinois Post-Conviction Hearing Act, under which relief had been sought and dismissed without opinion.

II. QUESTIONS OF STATE POWER

1. DUE PROCESS OF LAW

Free Speech. The Court at long last came to grips with the problem of motion picture censorship in Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson.⁸⁵ A unanimous Court held unconstitutional a portion of a New York statute which required the licensing of all films by administrative officials, and denied licenses to any film which is "obscene, indecent, immoral, inhuman, sacrilegious, or is of such a character that its exhibition would tend to corrupt morals or incite to crime." The responsible agency barred the Italian film The Miracle, after a hearing, as being "sacrilegious." Justice Clark took note of the 1915 case in which the Court had ruled that the exhibition of motion pictures was a business pure and simple, outside the guarantee of a free press.⁸⁶ He overruled it, and pointed out that it had been decided before the Court expanded the reach of due process in the Gillow case⁸⁷ in 1925.

Justice Clark asserted that there was no doubt of the fact "that motion pictures are a significant medium for the communication of ideas," in very many ways. Their importance is not lessened because they are "designed to entertain as well as to inform," nor does it matter that movies are exhibited for profit, since books, newspapers and magazines are also published for profit. Even if it is conceded that motion pictures have a greater capacity for evil, it does not follow that the "substantially unbridled censorship" present in this case is justified. It is clear that there is, under the Constitution, no absolute freedom to exhibit any kind of movie any time and in any place, and it is also true that movies are not necessarily subject to the same rules which govern other media of communication. Nevertheless, this statute imposes a previous restraint, and as was held in the Near case,⁸⁸ such restraint can be justified only in exceptional circumstances.

The New York Court of Appeals had defined "sacrilege" as meaning "that no religion, as that word is understood by the ordinary, reasonable person, shall be treated with contempt, mockery, scorn and ridicule." It also said that sacrilege is "the act of violating or profaning anything sacred." With such a statute, thus authoritatively defined, said Justice Clark, "the censor is set adrift upon a boundless sea amid a myriad of conflicting currents of religious views, with no charts but those provided by the most vocal and powerful orthodoxies." In fact, this test might raise substantial questions concerning the principle of the separation of church and state. "... The state has no legitimate interest in protecting any or all religions from views distasteful to them which is sufficient to justify prior restraints upon the expression of those views." Finally, Justice Clark drew attention to the fact that the Court was not deciding whether a state may censor motion pictures under a clearly-drawn statute designed to bar obscene films.

Justice Frankfurter filed a lengthy and learned concurring opinion, maintaining that as a technical ecclesiastical term sacrilege has a long history, and means essentially injury to priests and religious symbols. He thought that Catholic doctrine limited the term to protecting physical things against injurious acts. In English law sacrilege meant stealing from a church or otherwise damaging church property. This also is the dictionary and encyclopedia definition, as evidenced by numerous citations from the Eighteenth Century onwards. He also thought that the absence of an established church in the United States made the term even more vague. But as defined by the New York Court he maintained that the statute permits the censorship of religious opinions, and furthermore, that its lack of appropriate objective standards offends due process.⁸⁹

Another case of surpassing importance in the field of free speech was Beauharnais v. Illinois,⁹⁰ which, by a five-to-four vote, upheld for the first time the constitutionality of a group libel law.⁹¹ Beauharnais is president of a Chicago organization, the White Circle League, which demands the segregation of Negroes. On one occasion he distributed leaflets in the streets containing a petition to the City Council demanding segregation, and stated: "If persuasion and the need to prevent the white race from becoming mongrelized by the negro will not unite us, then the aggressions . . . rapes, robberies, knives, guns and marijuana of the negro, surely will." Beauharnais was convicted in the Municipal Court of Chicago and fined $200 for violating a statute which forbids the publication of "any lithography, moving picture, play, drama or sketch, which publication or exhibition portrays depravity, criminality, unchastity, or lack of virtue of a class of citizens, of any race, color, creed or religion which said publication or exhibition exposes the citizens of any race, color, creed or religion to contempt, derision, or obloquy or which is productive of breach of the peace or riots. . . ."

Speaking for the majority, Justice Frankfurter noted that the Illinois court treated this law as a criminal libel law, designed to prohibit words liable to cause a breach of the peace, and that this is the traditional justification for punishing libels criminally. Today every state punishes libels directed at individuals; if a state may do this, he maintained, then it may punish utterances directed at a defined group, unless the utterances are unrelated to the peace and well-being of the state. He thought there was plenty of evidence, both here and abroad, to support the conclusion of Illinois "that wilful purveyors of falsehood concerning racial and religious groups promote strife and tend powerfully to obstruct the manifold adjustments required for free, ordered life in a metropolitan, polyglot community." Illinois has a long and bitter history of racial tension and violence, from the murder of the abolitionist Lovejoy in 1837 to the Cicero riots of 1951. The law under discussion was enacted in 1917, when the state was struggling to assimilate vast numbers of new inhabitants. It is out of bounds, Justice Frankfurter declared, for the Court to say that this legislation will not help, since no one has the solution, and the legislature has a choice of policy so long as it is not unrelated to the problem. It would be "arrant dogmatism" for the Court to say that the legislature may not believe that speech directed at the reputation of groups cannot be outlawed. Justice Frankfurter also ruled that the statute was not void for vagueness. He saw no occasion for considering the "clear and present danger" test, since libellous utterances are not within the area of constitutionally protected speech.²²

Each of the four dissenters filed his own opinion. Justice Black thought that Beauharnais was exercising the constitutionally-guaranteed right to petition his elected representatives. He criticized the Court for ignoring the First Amendment, and for the fact that it "degrades First Amendment freedoms to the 'rational basis' level." And he rejected altogether the view that this matter must be left to legislative trial and error. "My own belief is that no legislature is charged with the duty or vested with the power to decide what public issues Americans can discuss." This statute, he asserted, imposes censorship upon every medium of communication, and to sugar coat it by calling it a group libel law may make it more palatable but not less deadly. The law of libel, he insisted, has always dealt with individuals, not huge groups.

Justice Reed thought the statute was too vague because of its use of such terms as "virtue," "derision," and "obloquy." While fully aware of the terrible evil of group vilification, Justice Douglas repeated his well-known arguments, that the First Amendment is couched in absolute terms, that speech has a preferred position in our constitutional law, and that the tendency of recent decisions of the Court to permit regulation of the right of free speech "within reasonable limits" was "an ominous and alarming trend." He declared that legislation dealing with free speech should not be considered in the same light as one considers social and economic legislation, for while the Constitution does not guarantee the economic status quo, it places free speech apart, "above and beyond the police power."

Justice Jackson's dissenting opinion sounded more like a concurring opinion. He did conclude that the petitioner had been denied proper safeguards at the trial, in that he was not given a chance to justify his statements by proving their truth, and was denied the defense of privilege as to comment on public matters. Furthermore, he thought there was no showing of any clear and present danger of an injury. Otherwise, his opinion was devoted to arguing mainly that the general restraints of the Fourteenth Amendment do not incorporate the more precise provisions of the First Amendment, and that the states have greater powers over this subject than does Congress. He would not limit the states to the severe standards appropriate for federal power, because the two great purposes of libel laws, to protect integrity of reputation and public tranquility, are not objects of federal cognizance, but are largely local functions. He thought that state libel laws do not present a threat to a free press because of the available safeguards: the right to jury trial of the law and facts, the defense of truth, and the clear and present danger rule.

Loyalty and Subversion. New York's Feinberg Law, adopted in 1949 to weed out subversives from the public schools, was sustained by a six-to-three vote in Adler v. Board of Education of the City of New York.⁹² It should be observed that well before 1949 New York laws denied any form of public employment to those who wilfully advocate or teach the overthrow of government by any unlawful means or organize or join any group advocating such a policy. The Feinberg Law was written to further implement established policy. It provides that the Board of Regents, "after inquiry, and after such notice and hearing as may be appropriate," shall prepare a list of subversive organizations. The Board is authorized to utilize any similar listings of any federal agency. Then the statute provides that membership in any listed organization "shall constitute prima facie evidence of disqualification." The preamble of the Feinberg Law made elaborate "findings" to the effect that members of subversive groups, and especially of the Communist party, have infiltrated into public employment in the public schools, are disseminating propaganda to children, do not follow the truth and free inquiry, and are very subtle and escape detection. Before one is fired or denied a job, he is given a right to a full hearing, with representation by counsel and a chance for judicial review. Justice Minton, speaking for the majority, stressed that the listings were made only after full notice and hearing, and that in addition the New York Court of Appeals had ruled that listed organizations have a right of review.

The Supreme Court ruled that this statute did not violate free speech. It is clear that persons have a right "to assemble, speak, think and believe as they will," but "it is equally clear they have no right to work for the State in the school system on their own terms."⁴ The state has a right to prescribe reasonable terms, and those who do not choose to work on such terms "are at liberty to retain their beliefs and associations and go elsewhere." The schoolroom, said Justice Minton, is a sensitive area, and the state has a vital concern in preserving its integrity. He then proceeded to give the doctrine of guilt by association the Court's stamp of approval in the following words: "One's associates, past and present, as well as one's conduct, may properly be considered in determining fitness and loyalty. From time immemorial, one's reputation has been determined in part by the company he keeps." Furthermore, Justice Minton ruled that the Feinberg Law did not conflict with the due process doctrine of unreasonable presumptions. The New York court construed the statute as requiring that the member of the organization must have known about its purpose. The legislative presumption that a member of such an organization supports the things the organization stands for is not contrary to fact or the "generality of experience." Nor was there any denial of procedural due process, since the presumption is not conclusive, and arises in a hearing where the person against whom it is drawn has full opportunity to rebut it. The constitutional issue of vagueness was not considered because it had not been raised in the state courts.

Justice Black dissented briefly, lamenting the "rapidly multiplying legislative enactments which make it dangerous—this time for school teachers—to think or say anything except what a transient majority happen to approve at the moment." Justice Frankfurter dissented on the theory that the issues were not ripe for litigation, since the legislative scheme had not yet been put into effect, and the issues were therefore merely abstract and speculative. In addition to crying before they were hurt, the eight petitioners had no standing to sue, either as taxpayers or parents, the injury being either de minimis or altogether too tenuous or argumentative. Justice Douglas dissented on the merits in a noble statement which will live as long as Americans remain interested in human freedom. It must be read in full to be appreciated. He refused to concede that a civil servant can be forced to sacrifice his civil rights; he vigorously rejected the concept of guilt by association, and warned that the sanctioned procedure will raise havoc with academic freedom. "Youthful indiscretions, mistaken causes, misguided enthusiasms—all long forgotten—become the ghosts of a harrowing present. Any organization committed to a liberal cause, any group organized to revolt against an hysterical trend, any committee launched to sponsor an unpopular program becomes suspect.

These are the organizations into which Communists often infiltrate. Their presence infects the whole, even though the project was not conceived in sin. A teacher caught in that mesh is almost certain to stand condemned." Furthermore, once membership is established, the views of the teacher must be examined to decide whether his connection was or is innocent. Thus, "the law inevitably turns the school system into a spying project." Of course, he concluded, the country's schools need not become forums for spreading the Marxist creed, but the guilt of the teacher should turn on overt acts; his private life and political and social philosophy should not be the cause of reprisals.

Religious Freedom. In 1948, eight Justices agreed in the McColum case⁶⁶ that a "released time" plan of religious instruction in the public schools of Champaign, Illinois, was forbidden by the Fourteenth Amendment as being inconsistent with the principle of the separation of church and state. The instruction was given during school time in the public school buildings, by outside religious teachers supplied by the various denominations. The Court's decision was promptly subjected to an extraordinary amount of heated criticism. Apparently the Court couldn't take it, for in *Zorach v. Clauson*⁶⁷ a majority of six Justices beat a retreat. This case involved a test of the New York City program of "dismissed time," the only difference being that the children leave the school buildings and go to religious centers for their religious instruction. All the other circumstances were about the same as in McColum. The parents must request dismissal of students; the churches supply the application blanks; those not released stay in the classrooms; the churches report attendance; above all, religious training is given during school time. In New York the teachers are forbidden to announce the program to the students and to comment on attendance or nonattendance. The Zorach litigation was initiated by two men as taxpayers, residents and parents. The trial court denied a motion for a trial on the asserted issues of fact, and dismissed the proceedings on the merits. The New York Court of Appeals approved of this procedure on the ground that the matters pleaded were not well pleaded, a great many of petitioners' allegations being "conclusory in character," insufficiently supported by facts.⁶⁷ Furthermore, the New York court ruled that many of the conclusory allegations suggest merely that teachers have been disobeying the rules and regulations. If true, this would warrant at most disciplinary proceedings against the offending teachers, not a total discontinuance of the program, which was the relief prayed for.

Justice Douglas delivered the opinion of the Court. He made it clear that the wisdom or efficiency of the program from an educational point of view was no concern of the Court. Furthermore, he thought it would take "obtuse reasoning" to inject into this case any issue of freedom of religion, since nothing in the record showed that any student was forced to take religious instruction. The school authorities were neutral. The refusal of the state courts to permit the introduction of evidence on the issue of coercion, Justice Douglas ruled, rested on an independent state ground, and therefore was not reviewable. Since the allegation did not even implicate the school authorities, he insisted that it cannot be said that a federal right was being defeated by a rule of local practice. Finally, he held that this program was not an establishment of religion within the meaning of the First Amendment. It is clear beyond doubt that this Amendment decrees a "complete and unequivocal" separation, but it "does not say that in every and all respects there shall be a separation." Church and state are not required to be hostile and suspicious aliens to each other. Thus, churches enjoy tax exemptions, police and fire protection; prayers are given in legislative halls; messages of the Chief Executive appeal to God; oaths are given in courts, etc. It would be pushing the principle of separation to extremes to hold the New York law unconstitutional. "We are a religious people whose institutions presuppose a Supreme Being," said Justice Douglas. "When the state encourages religious instruction or cooperates with religious authorities by adjusting the schedule of public events to sectarian needs, it follows the best of our traditions." Finally, Justice Douglas distinguished the McCormack case on the ground that there the public school classrooms were used for religious instruction. Here the public schools do no more than accommodate their schedules to a program of outside religious instruction. "We follow the McCormack case. But we cannot expand it to cover" this situation, for "we cannot read into the Bill of Rights such a philosophy of hostility to religion."

Justices Black, Frankfurter, and Jackson each filed a dissenting opinion. They could see no significant difference between this case and McCormack. The distinction, said Justice Jackson, is "trivial, almost to the point of cynicism." Actually, Justice Black asserted, McCormack held that the state cannot constitutionally manipulate the compelled classroom hours of its compulsory school machinery so as to channel children into sectarian classes, and yet that is exactly what New York does here. As to Americans being a religious people, he pointed out that this was quite as true when the First Amendment was adopted. He also noted that since the New York regulations refer to "duly constituted religious bodies," the state will have to decide what constitutes a religion; this is censorship, which is what the Constitution forbids. The American people have always been divided into many sects, and this was and is the justification for the constitutional mandate to keep church and state "completely separate." Justice Black also thought that the Court's opinion drew an invidious distinction between religionists and nonbelievers. He concluded: "State help to religion injects political and party prejudices into a holy field. It too often substitutes force for prayer, hate for love, and persecution for persuasion. Government should not be allowed, under cover of the soft euphemism of 'co-operation,' to steal into the sacred area of religious choice."

Justice Frankfurter conceded, as the majority opinion argued, that the state may close the schools so that pupils may attend religious exercises; it may dismiss classes for any reason or no reason. But the essence of this case is that New York did not suspend operations. He said: "There is all the difference in the world between letting the children out of school and letting some of them out of school into religious classes. . . . The pith of the case is that formalized religious instruction is substituted for other school activity which those who do not participate in the released-time program are compelled to attend." And he complained that there was no proof of coercion because the petitioners were not allowed to make proof of it, and insisted that issues raising federal claims cannot be foreclosed by state rules of practice.

Justice Jackson thought it was clear that the New York program was founded on a use of the state's power of coercion. It is the truant officer who makes this system more effective than voluntary attendance after school hours; the school serves "as a temporary jail for a pupil who will not go to Church." And he declared that his position was not anti-religious. "My evangelistic brethren confuse an objection to compulsion with an objection to religion."

At long last, the Court had a chance, in Doremus v. Board of Education of Hawthorne,⁹⁸ to rule on the constitutionality of Bible-reading in public schools, but refused to take it. The case tested the validity of a New Jersey statute requiring the reading, without comment,⁹⁹ of five verses of the Old Testament at the opening of each school day. Six Justices voted to dismiss an appeal on jurisdictional grounds. As to the petitioner who sued as a parent, it was noted that the child had since graduated, and therefore the case was moot. In any event, Justice Jackson pointed out that any student on request of the parents could be excused from Bible-reading, and hence no child was compelled to do anything, even to listen. The other petitioner was a taxpayer, and the Court ruled that he had not shown any direct injury, even though he may have had standing to sue under state practice. Of course, said Justice Jackson, a state court may give an advisory opinion on a federal constitutional question, but it isn't reviewable unless there is "a good-faith pocketbook action." He could find here no "direct and particular financial interest"; the grievance "is not a direct dollars-and-cents injury but is a religious difference." This is the first time the Supreme Court has ever said that the federal Frothingham rule¹⁰⁰ forbidding taxpayers' suits in federal courts for lack of interest applies to reviews of state cases. Speaking for three dissenters, Justice Douglas pointed out what most observers would take as a self-evident proposition, that "New Jersey can fashion her own rules governing the institution of suits in her courts."

tentiary filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus alleging that while he was living in Chicago, Michigan officers forcibly seized him and took him to Michigan, thus violating his due process rights. The District Court denied the writ without a hearing, but the Court of Appeals reversed on the ground that the Federal Kidnaping Act had changed the rule of prior holdings. The Supreme Court disagreed,¹⁰¹ asserting that it has never departed from the rule of Ker v. Illinois,¹⁰² that the power of a court to try a person for crime is not impaired by the fact that he had been brought within the court's jurisdiction by a forcible abduction. Due process is satisfied, said Justice Black, if the defendant had fair notice of the charges and a fair trial. The Constitution does not require a court "to permit a guilty person rightfully convicted to escape justice because he was brought to trial against his will." It is for Congress, not the Court, to add to the sanctions written into the Federal Kidnaping Act a further sanction barring a state from prosecuting persons wrongfully brought to it by its officers.

Oregon is the only state in the Union which requires a person accused of crime who pleads insanity as a defense to carry the burden of proof, and to establish his defense beyond a reasonable doubt. This is the English rule and was also the rule of most American courts in the Nineteenth Century. The rule for federal prosecutions, announced by Justice Harlan in 1895 in Davis v. United States,¹⁰³ is that an accused is "entitled to an acquittal of the specific crime charged if upon all the evidence there is reasonable doubt whether he was capable in law of committing crime." In *Leland v. Oregon*¹⁰⁴ the Court held, by a seven-to-two vote, that Oregon is not obliged to follow the Davis rule, which is not a constitutional doctrine but only a rule of practice to be followed in federal courts. Justice Clark also noted that some twenty states place the burden on the defendant of establishing his insanity by a preponderance of the evidence, and he thought the difference between this standard and Oregon's is not of such magnitude as to be determinative of the constitutional issue. Above all, it was emphasized that in order to convict, Oregon required the prosecutor to prove every element of the offense charged beyond a reasonable doubt, and that only on the issue of insanity was the burden of proof placed on the defendant. In all English-speaking courts, he pointed out, the defendant is obliged to introduce proof if he would overcome the presumption of sanity. But in addition, the Oregon statute provides that proof of a "morbid propensity" is not sufficient to support the defense of insanity. Justice Clark said that this merely means that the state has adopted the "right and wrong" test of legal insanity, instead of the "irresistible impulse" test, and that the former is the exclusive test of criminal responsibility in a majority of American jurisdictions. He refused to believe that the science of psychiatry has come so far that the states should be compelled to eliminate the "right and wrong" test from their criminal law.

Justice Frankfurter, with whom Justice Black agreed, filed a dissenting opinion. He agreed that in the present state of knowledge no single test of insanity can be imposed on the states, but he argued that when a state has chosen its theory for testing culpability, it is a denial of due process to send a man to his doom if he cannot prove beyond a reasonable doubt that he was insane. Oregon, in his judgment, is the only state which makes inroads on the principle that the state must prove guilt by requiring the accused to prove beyond a reasonable doubt the absence of one of the essential elements for the commission of murder, culpability.

Coerced Confessions. A novel question reached the Court in Rochin v. California.¹⁰⁶ When Los Angeles policemen, on information that Rochin was selling narcotics, unlawfully entered his dwelling, he swallowed two capsules containing morphine. He was taken to a hospital, his stomach was pumped against his will, and he was convicted on the basis of the regurgitated evidence. The Court by unanimous vote set aside the conviction. Justice Frankfurter put the decision on due process grounds, that is to say, he found that this "conduct shocks the [his?] conscience." To permit this brutal conduct, he said, would discredit the law and brutalize society. Justice Black, concurring separately, thought this was a clear case of self-incrimination, repeating once more his well-known objections to reliance upon the "nebulous standards" of due process when the specific provisions of the Fifth Amendment afford a much better protection for human rights. And Justice Douglas observed, that since all but four states apparently would admit this evidence, how can the Court say that what California did violated the "decencies of civilized conduct?" He too thought the Fifth Amendment provided "an unequivocal, definite and workable rule of evidence for state and federal courts."

In two cases¹⁰⁶ appeals raised questions concerning confessions allegedly coerced, but in both of them the Court affirmed the convictions, treating the question of voluntariness as the decisive issue. In both cases Justices Black and Douglas dissented because the confessions were obtained by the police before arraignment. These are additional phases of a long campaign by these two Justices to discourage the police practice of holding persons for questioning incommunicado.

Right to Counsel. The prevailing rule is that a defendant in a noncapital state criminal case is constitutionally entitled to representation by counsel only if there are special circumstances showing that justice could not be had without counsel. In *Palmer v. Ashe*¹⁰⁷ five Justices ruled that a young irresponsible boy who had been incarcerated previously for imbecility came within this rule.¹⁰⁸ In a case coming up from Pennsylvania,¹⁰⁹ judgment was reversed on the authority of Townsend v. Burke,¹¹⁰ which held that due process has been denied where the lack of counsel at the time of sentencing resulted in actual prejudice to the defendant.¹¹¹

Jurisdiction to Tax. An Ohio corporation owns boats and barges which it employs for the transportation of oil along the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers. While the vehicles are registered in Cincinnati, and are stopped in Ohio occasionally for fuel or repairs, they neither pick up nor discharge oil in Ohio, their main terminals are in four other states, and the mileage travelled through waters bordering Ohio is very small. The Court held, two Justices dissenting, that an Ohio ad valorem personal property tax on the full value of all these vessels violated due process.¹¹² The rule now is that the apportionment principle which is applied to railroad cars used in interstate commerce also applies to vessels moving in interstate operations in inland waters.¹¹³ "The rule which permits taxation by two or more states on an apportionment basis," Justice Douglas stated, "precludes taxation of all of the property by the state of the domicile." Otherwise there would be multiple taxation of interstate operations, and the tax would be unrelated to the benefits extended by the taxing state.

meetings, payment of salaries, purchasing of machinery, stock transfers, banking operations, etc. A nonresident of Ohio filed an action in personam against the company, for dividends and damages due to failure to issue stock certificates, in the Ohio Court of Common Pleas. The trial court sustained a motion to quash the service of summons on the defendant, and the Supreme Court of Ohio affirmed. The U.S. Supreme Court vacated judgment and remanded the case, on the ground that while federal due process does not compel a state to open its courts to a proceeding against a foreign corporation to enforce a cause of action not arising in the state and unrelated to the corporation's activities within the state, due process does not on the other hand prohibit Ohio from granting such relief.¹¹⁴ Whether such a suit can be brought depends upon whether the business done in Ohio by the foreign corporation was sufficiently substantial, and reviewing the facts, the Court found that the Ohio activities were substantial. The conclusion was that it would not violate due process for Ohio either to take or decline jurisdiction.

2. STATE POWER OVER ELECTIONS

There were two interesting cases during the Term dealing with state legislation affecting the conduct of elections. *Ray v. Blair*¹¹⁵ sustained a requirement made by the Alabama State Executive Committee of the Democratic party, pursuant to statutory authority, that every candidate for presidential elector pledge himself to support any candidate named by the Democratic National Convention. It will be recalled that in 1948 one Tennessee elector chosen on the Truman ticket voted for the Dixiecrat candidate. The Alabama Supreme Court had ruled that this pledge was in violation of the Twelfth Amendment, under which the electors are free agents. Speaking for a majority of five, Justice Reed pointed out that the requirement of a pledge from primary candidates is not unusual, especially in the one-party South. He argued that while presidential electors exercise a federal function, they are not federal officers; they act by authority of the state, which in turn gets its authority from the federal Constitution, and the Constitution does not forbid this pledge. Thus it is immaterial whether the primary is part of the election machinery, for the question is whether some constitutional provision is violated. Justice Reed ruled that the Twelfth Amendment does not require absolute freedom for the elector; it does not prevent an elector from pledging himself in advance, and as a matter of history it is known that electors are never expected to do otherwise than support the party nominees. In fact, more than twenty states do not even print the names of the candidates for elector on the ballot. Whether or not the pledge is legally enforceable has nothing to do with the issue of the validity of the pledge itself.

Justice Black, who is from Alabama, and Justice Frankfurter, who was ill, and who feels that he ought to record the reason for not participating, took no part in the disposition of this case. Justice Jackson, in a dissenting opinion concurred in by Justice Douglas, maintained that the original intent was that electors would be free agents, and that the powers granted federal officials by the Constitution cannot be forfeited by the Court for disuse. "A political practice which has its origin in custom must rely upon custom for its sanctions." He thought it would be a gain to abolish the whole electoral college system and provide for direct popular election of the President, but he complained that the Court's decision moves in the direction of entrenching the worst features of the existing system. Above all, he argued that the Court's sanctioning of this "new instrument of power" would strengthen and centralize party control. He seemed to take it for granted that this would be a bad thing.

*Day-Brite Lighting, Inc. v. Missouri*¹¹⁶ upheld a state law providing that an employee may absent himself from his employment for four hours between the opening and closing of the polls without penalty or deduction of wages, the employer specifying the hours. Justice Douglas brushed aside the appeal to liberty of contract, which once carried so much weight: "Our recent decisions make plain that we do not sit as a super-legislature to weigh the wisdom of legislation nor to decide whether the policy which it expresses offends the public welfare." Justice Douglas regarded the Missouri law as a form of minimum wage requirement, though not for the usual purpose of protecting health and morals, but rather "to safeguard the right of suffrage," which in our system is "basic and fundamental." Due process is not necessarily transgressed by requiring the employer to pay wages for the period when the employee performs no services. Many forms of regulation reduce the net return of the enterprise, and most regulations of business impose financial burdens without compensation. Justice Jackson dissented because the voter in question lived only 200 feet from the polling place and it actually took him only about five minutes to vote. He thought the analogy with minimum wage laws was "farfetched and unconvincing." And he observed that "a state-imposed pay-for-voting system appear[s] to be a confession of failure of popular representative government."

3. STATE POWER AND THE COMMERCE CLAUSE

Regulation. San Diego County, California, requires all cab drivers to take out permits, upon payment of a $1 annual fee, and after passing an examination testing knowledge of the vehicle code, traffic regulations and the geography of the county. Permits may be denied for bad moral character, violation of the regulations, or conviction for an offense involving moral turpitude. The Court held, by a five-to-four vote, that the ordinance could be applied to cab drivers who picked up passengers in Mexico and transported them across the unincorporated area of the county solely to points outside the area.¹¹⁷ The Court found that the Federal Motor Carrier Act of 1935 and the relevant ICC regulations did not preempt the field, and further, that the operation of taxicabs is a local business, which is why Congress left the field largely to the states. Absent discriminatory treatment or the imposition of a direct burden, the regulation in this fashion of all taxicabs operating in the community affects interstate and foreign commerce only indirectly. The four dissenting Justices thought that the petitioners were engaged solely in foreign commerce, and that the local ordinance levied a tax on the privilege of engaging in such commerce.

Taxation. The operator of a laundry and cleaning establishment in Memphis, Tennessee, sends ten of his trucks to eight Mississippi counties where his drivers pick up, deliver and collect for laundry and cleaning, and seek new customers. He was required to pay a Mississippi privilege tax of $50 for each driver for the privilege of soliciting business for a laundry not licensed in the state. The state supreme court held that the drivers were "transient vendors or dealers" and hence taxable. The U.S. Supreme Court reversed, taking the state court's word for it that this was a privilege tax for soliciting business.¹¹⁸ In a long line of "drummer" cases, beginning with the Robbins case,¹¹⁹ the Court had ruled that a tax on the solicitation of interstate business is a tax on interstate commerce itself. Even if the tax is on the picking up and delivery of laundry and cleaning, within the meaning of the "peddler" cases, the Court found that there was an unconstitutional discrimination against interstate commerce, because those working for local laundries were required to pay only $8 per truck.

4. INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS

State Enforcement of Federal Law. In an action in a state court under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, the Court held that the question of the validity of a release granted to the carrier by the injured employee was a federal question, to be determined by federal rather than state law.¹²⁰ The jury had ruled for the worker on the basis of the evidence, but the trial judge had entered judgment for the carrier on the ground that the employee had been guilty of supine negligence in signing a release. The Court ruled that the right of recovery was granted by Congress and cannot be defeated by permitting the states to have the last word as to defenses. Furthermore, there ought to be a uniform application of the federal act. Four Justices disagreed with that portion of the opinion which held that the employee was entitled to a jury trial as a basic remedy under the federal statute.

Intergovernmental Taxation. Section 9(b) of the Atomic Energy Act of 1946 provides: "The Commission, and the property, activities, and income of the Commission, are hereby expressly exempted from taxation in any manner or form by any State, county, municipality, or any subdivision thereof." The Court held that under this section, two private companies who were contractors on a cost-plus basis with the Atomic Energy Commission, and two merchants who sold goods to these contractors, were exempt from state use and sales taxes respectively.¹²¹ The contracts were regarded as "activities" within the meaning of the Act. The statute adopted as a national policy the use of management contracts for the operation of government-owned plants. The Atomic Energy Commission's activities can be performed by it directly or through the agencies of private enterprise. Congress used the word "activities" in a broad sense to include all functions of the Commission. Since this question was covered by the statute, there was no occasion to discuss any problems of implied constitutional immunity.

Interstate Comity. The Alaska Legislature provided for the licensing of commercial fishermen in territorial waters, imposing a $5 license fee on residents, and a $50 fee on nonresidents. The Court by a six-to-three vote declared the statute invalid under the rule of Toomer v. Witsell,¹²² which held that a state cannot charge different and higher fees unless they are related to higher costs of administration.¹²³ Relevant sections of the Organic Act led to the conclusion that Congress did not authorize the Territorial Legislature to treat citizens of the states in a manner not permitted to the states themselves in their treatment of citizens of sister states. The Comity Clause of the Constitution therefore applied.

Full Faith and Credit. Questions regarding divorce decrees continue to be grist for the full faith and credit mill. In one case the Court ruled that it is to be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that a Florida court which granted a decree of divorce had jurisdiction over both parties, thereby rendering the issue of jurisdiction over the cause res judicata on a collateral attack in another state.¹²⁴ Another case presented a more complicated problem.¹²⁵ Sutton divorced Leib in an Illinois state court, with judgment for alimony until remarriage. Later Sutton remarried in Nevada, but this marriage was subsequently annulled in New York. Then Sutton sued Leib for unpaid installments of alimony in a federal district court in Illinois, under its diversity jurisdiction, relying upon her New York annulment decree as determining that her Nevada marriage was void. She contended that the Full Faith and Credit Clause requires Illinois to hold the Nevada marriage void ab initio by virtue of the New York annulment. Both the District Court and the Court of Appeals ruled, however, that since the Nevada marriage was valid in Nevada, it terminated the liability for alimony under the Illinois judgment of divorce. In other words, they gave full faith and credit to the Nevada marriage rather than the New York annulment. The Supreme Court held that as a matter of constitutional law Illinois is free to decide for itself the effect of New York's declaration of annulment on the obligations of Leib, a stranger to that decree. The case was therefore remanded to the Court of Appeals, with direction to determine just what the Illinois rule was. Justice Frankfurter took the occasion to remark in a concurring opinion that this case illustrates what little excuse there is left for the diversity jurisdiction since the Tompkins case.¹²⁶ If there is no Illinois rule, then the federal Court of Appeals will have to fashion one, but it will be tentative at best because only the Illinois Supreme Court can settle the issue. He preferred to remand the case with instructions to hold it until the petitioner gets a decision in the Illinois courts.

One final full faith and credit problem remains to be discussed. Nelson was killed when one of United's airliners crashed in Utah. Claiming $200,000 under the Utah wrongful death statute, Nelson's executor, an Illinois bank, brought an action in the federal District Court in Illinois. The decedent had been a resident and citizen of Illinois. United is a Delaware corporation doing business in Illinois, and suit was brought under the diversity of citizenship jurisdiction. An Illinois statute provides that "no action shall be brought or prosecuted in this State to recover damages for a death occurring outside of this State where a right of action for such death exists under the laws of the place where such death occurred and service of process in such suit may be had upon the defendant in such place." The District Court and the Court of Appeals both dismissed on the basis of the Tompkins rule. The Supreme Court reversed,¹²⁷ holding that it was unnecessary to consider Tompkins problems because the case was controlled by the recent decision in Hughes v. Fetter,¹²⁸ which held a similar Wisconsin statute to be in violation of the Full Faith and Credit Clause. The only difference Justice Black could find between the two statutes was that the Wisconsin statute barred suit in Wisconsin courts for any wrongful death caused outside the state, whereas the Illinois statute permits suit if service cannot be had in the state where the death occurred. He said: "That Illinois is willing for its courts to try some out-of-state death actions is no reason for its refusal to grant full faith and credit as to others." Justice Jackson, with whom Justice Minton agreed, filed a concurring opinion to argue that the Tompkins rule did not apply, because this case did not involve a substantive rule of law, or "rule of decision." And he complained that the Court was silent on the question as to which law shall be applied in this case. Actually, he argued, the Court in effect said that the law of Illinois was wrong, then remade the Illinois law, and then said that the federal court applies Illinois law. He believed that the federal district court could apply the laws of Utah without straining them through the Illinois sieve. Justices Reed and Frankfurter dissented for the reasons given in the Hughes case, where both had dissented.

NOTES ON THE THEORY OF POLITICAL OPINION FORMATION

AVERY LEISERSON
Vanderbilt University

I. OPINION FORMATION IN THE POLITICAL PROCESS

The role of public opinion in the political process is more often justified than explained by political theorists. Insofar as contemporary theory offers an explanation, it replaces the primitive democratic notion of "The People as Legislator" with a neo-idealistic conception of public opinion as the "sense of the community" (A. D. Lindsay), an emergent product of the process of public discussion that enfolds the struggle of private group leaders, public administrators, and political representatives to influence the substance and direction of governmental policy.

However, this is not the meaning of the term as used either by the man in the street or by the social scientist. In both popular and scientific language "public opinion" has come to refer to a sort of secular idol, and is a "god-term" to which citizens, scientists, and office-holders alike pay allegiance, partly as an act of faith, partly as a matter of observation, partly as a condition of sanity. The public opinion idol has its high priests, claiming to be expert translators of the oracles of the personified deity. The idol also has its heretics, divided like all protestants into many denominations. The least heretical sect, perhaps, consists of those who postulate a conceptual fiction somewhat resembling the legal relation of "principal-and-agent," except that they recognize that political representatives possess the power to act as trustees as well as agents of their amorphous principal. An agnostic position is taken by some emancipated souls who suggest that the influence of public opinion is best understood by comparing it to the effect of weather on behavior—pervasive, varying by geographical areas, penetrating or enervating, as the case may be, perceived and enforced through our pores and central nervous systems rather than by determinate physical sanctions. The atheistic position is held by extreme advocates of the view that there is no general public opinion common to the community as a whole, but that we have a series of public opinions, ideologies, world views, and thought patterns, corresponding to determinate class cleavages or divisions in society. The most aggressive unbelievers consist of those who replace public opinion with the symbols of "Society" or "Culture," and preach that political behavior is only a derivation of deeper social uniformities resulting from the interaction of personality and culture in the critical stages of maturation when individuals undergo their common socializing experience, integrated, e.g., with the adjustments between parents and siblings in the family, sexual attitudes, the development of moral codes and religious beliefs, educational experience, social role and class position and mobility, and so on.

To modern empirical ears, there is an air of futility and triviality about all controversies over the nature and role of public opinion whose theoretical foundations boil down to religious symbolism, legal fictions, or physiological metaphors. Why not go out and directly ask people how they feel about public affairs? Once the distinction is recognized between legal sovereignty (predominant power in the constitutional system) and political sovereignty (predominant sentiment in the population to which power-holders feel impelled to acknowledge obedience), the question naturally arises as to why it is not possible to reject all this "group personality" and "State-fiction" business, and simply act on the hypothesis that public opinion can be identified directly by asking people questions about how they feel about things. So present-day opinion research, armed with the techniques of sampling, questionnaire-drafting, coding, and interviewing, suggests an operational definition of public opinion as "the distribution in the political community of people's response to issues, personalities, symbols, or events." Classified by significant correlates of opinion such as national origin, race, sex, education, religion, socio-economic status, area of residence, and so forth, the results of opinion surveys are tremendously helpful in discriminating between fact and fancy in the analysis of public wants and feelings, particularly in discriminating group differences.

This gain in clarity, however, is achieved by concentrating on the mass-verbalized-response end of the political continuum. The processes by which persons and groups characterized by different social viewpoints and attributes are actually connected with opinion-leaders and policy-makers are considered to be "another problem." If public policy is defined as "the authoritative program directives and decisions which establish the purposes and limits of action by public officials," nothing is clearer than that public opinion is not identical with policy formation. This is not to say that opinion research has no value. The point is that opinion research seeks to extrapolate public opinion from the complexity of the political process, in which public officials and governmental opinion leaders who assume responsibility for program formulation have already anticipated the consequences of public scrutiny of their views upon their respective positions of responsibility and influence. The political scientist's conception of public opinion demands that research be focussed upon behavior in this more inclusive context, which thus assumes a discrepancy between public and political opinion.

If we, as students of government, are more interested in the larger political process that relates political leadership and popular opinion in the formation of policy, then the character of that relationship ought to be stated. Harold Lasswell sought to identify it by giving the name "political opinion" to the predominant sentiment that supports the power position of political leaders or elites, and "propaganda" to the manipulative techniques by which such policy-makers influence mass attitudes on controversial issues. Greatly influenced by Robert Michels, Lasswell constructed a conceptual model of the political process as a determinate hierarchy of authority, controlled by leaders at the apex who act on behalf of the classes in society from which they are recruited or upon whose ideological support their retention of power depends.¹ In this context, public opinion refers to the frequency distribution of attitudes on political subjects in the population at large. Political opinion denotes a psychological relation—a circular or reciprocal process of symbolic interaction—between leaders seeking to acquire or retain power by identifying their public personalities, beliefs, or programs with the beliefs and values of a mass political audience. Policy, originating in the strategic aims and tactical objectives of power-holders, is thus limited by the extent to which the conditions necessary for their achievement can be made to appear natural, necessary, or desirable to the perceptual structure of the audience. Policy also may be modified by the practical necessities of securing a predominant basis of agreement or acceptance on the part of other organized and politically important publics. From the standpoint of any given elite, the relation between public opinion and propaganda may be visualized as a technical division of labor, as follows:

- (1) The power-holders' activity of strategic policy determination.
- (2) The intelligence operations of gathering, analysing, and reporting data concerning the ideological and material position of one's allies and opponents and intermediate entities.
- (3) The information operations of initiating thematic ideas underlying the presentation of opinion-forming materials, and deriving appropriate channels for release through the mass media.
- (4) The managerial function of coordinating publicity with tactical operations at appropriate levels of decision.

The Lasswellian conception of political opinion probably provides the most adequate formulation available of the "instrumentalist" view of the relation between political leadership and public opinion. It clarifies the common theoretical orientation of public information programs in both private and governmental organizations, not to mention military psychological warfare. It is coherent, communicable, researchable. There are two vital objections, however, to generalizing this conception to the total political process. The first point is that the approach is vague about the determinants of policy beyond specifying the class and personality attributes of power-holders at top levels of organization. The problem of factional or multi-group support for political leadership is simply assumed away. Also excluded are (1) the situation and (2) the alternatives of action. The anticipatory effects of traditional popular loyalties and expectations upon the premises of policy-thinking, to say nothing of the conditioning effect of the training process during which leadership capacity and reputation are acquired, are either neglected or dismissed. In spite of its emphasis upon the psychodynamics of power, the "tool" conception of political opinion minimizes the process by which conflicting values inherent in public opinion are internalized within the personalities of power-holders, qualifying their psychological fitness and objective capacity for meeting the institutional requirements of public office.

The second objection is even more fundamental. It goes to the question of whether the single hierarchy of authority can be considered as the typical model of political society, or whether the general case consists of a number of competing, relatively autonomous units of political influence, within each of which the instrumental conception of political opinion may be said to apply. Obviously, the "limiting" and "directive" functions of public opinion operate differently under conditions when significant differences in policy views are resolved within a single organization effectively monopolizing political influence and within a pluralistic political universe in which intergroup competition for control of policy is institutionalized and continually exposed to an open forum of public discussion. Nevertheless, even the brief constitutional history of Soviet Russia has revealed the sensitiveness of Soviet leadership to political opinion (a) during the conflicts between the heirs of Marx and Lenin for the power to interpret the Marxian gospel, and (b) in working out the conflicts involved in coordinating the power elements separately organized in the party, the Soviets, and the functional organs of administration.

In brief, the implications of the foregoing analysis can be summed up in the following propositions:

1. Public opinion cannot be significantly interpreted in isolation from the historical, structural, and interest-group components of the power equilibrium in the community.
2. The conception of politics which restricts political opinion to the role of a mere tool of leadership is but a partial view of the relation between public opinion and public policy.
3. Adequate political perspective visualizes the political process as the conditions under which political leaders compete for positions of public responsibility for coordinating multi-individual or group interests and value conflicts.
4. Stabilized government presupposes a symbolic structure of political authority with which personal and mass loyalties have to be identified; if these loyalties are displaced by revolutionary propaganda, they have to be projected upon another system of legitimate authority.
5. Politics may also be considered in another aspect, as a continuing, functional process of political management, or determination of the purposes and limits of administrative action. Modern political science rejects the notion that political decisions are provisioned or predetermined by an omniscient mind, or by an automatically functioning planning authority, or by an omnipotent socio-political elite whose ideology provides an unquestionable basis for deriving policy in indeterminate situations. Public policy emerges as a composite product of physical force (actual or implicit), economic sanctions, mass public persuasion, and rational discussion, participated in and fostered by influential leaders representing significant elements of group opinion.
6. Analysis of the political management function in relation to the vital problem of mobilizing opinion reveals the opinion-forming process operating at successive leadership levels. At subordinate levels, political opinion is constantly being mobilized in support of leadership within each of an indeterminate number of inchoate or potential and organized publics. Each participating agency in policy formation faces internal problems of achieving inner unity and at the same time sufficient recognition from outside publics to establish influence of its own leadership.
7. The higher function of political coordination arises from the objective necessity of formulating programs of governmental (administrative) action compatible with the maintenance of the structure of political opinion in the community as a whole. Group leaders are forced to recognize the need either for direct collaboration with other influential groups in order to establish a working preponderance of power consistent with a relatively stable, but contingent equilibrium of political influence, or for submitting to the coordinating role of politicians capable of analyzing the requirements and possibilities of the situation and proposing programmatic solutions for intergroup conflict that are acceptable to popular sentiment. The higher function of political management may be monopolized by a single social class or political party, or it may be divided up among several organs of political influence; but it cannot be abdicated without undermining the vital structure of political opinion that enables society to cohere.

II. POLITICAL RESEARCH AND THE MASS MEDIA

As Lowell and Lippmann pointed out, the significance of the mass media lies in their strategic function of formulating the content and emphasis of issues brought to public attention. While this is a far cry from identifying the content of mass communications with public opinion, nevertheless the leadership role of the media in "structuring the situation" for their reader or listener is of inestimable political importance. As Bernard Berelson has shown, communications media affect public opinion, and public opinion affects the media, in more or less specified ways; but this approach provides no conceptual picture of the press or the radio or the movies as political entities in themselves, with historic organizational, interlapping functional relationships with other centers of influence in society. The hypothesis of political research into the relations of the media to public opinion is that the media should be analyzed as political structures of interest and organization, fulfilling educational and entertainment functions of the highest public importance, controlled and operated by individuals capable of acting both in the public interest and in the pursuit of private or partial group interests.

Considerable research has already been undertaken into the structure of political opinion represented by the organization and control of the opinion industries. Some of the propositions established by such research are the following: (1) the political role of the media varies both with its managers' conception of the role of the enterprise in the life of the community and with the number and type of group interests upon which its financial solvency depends. (2) The conditions suitable for the survival of the mass media as free private enterprises vary with the conditions of competitive entry into the business, freedom of access to sources and facilities for information, and the conditions of responsibility imposed upon staff personnel for approving the content of disseminated materials. (3) The quality of performance of the communications industries in meeting their responsibilities of freedom in a democratic polity depends upon the social origins, group affiliations, and qualifications of competence and job survival acquired by reporters, commentators, editors and publishers in the course of their training and experience. Thus there is already considerable evidence upon which to build further research into the politics of the mass media—the relations of its controlling values to those of the society of which they are a part, the internal and external pressures to which policy-makers at operating levels are institutionally exposed, and the professional and social standards of decision that are applied by administrative personnel in determining content. Available studies of the economic structure of the media constitute only a starting-point for the investigation of the power relationships at policy-making levels of organization.

For most students of politics and government, the significant area of research into the mass media centers upon their functional relationship to the structure of political opinion in the community. One set of questions here has traditionally involved the constitutional position of the media themselves, because their legal rights and obligations are an essential condition of their political influence. Most of the work in this field has been done by constitutional lawyers and political analysts, concentrating upon the permissible conditions that government may impose on the right to do business and upon the judicial sanctions to which the media are exposed for injuring individuals or violating public standards of security and morals. Important as the constitutional value problems are, emphasis in the future will probably be placed less upon judicial doctrines than upon the policy questions involved in the operating relationships between the media and the political and administrative agencies of government. For example, how shall the media permit themselves to be utilized by the President, Congress, the military agencies, the State Department, or the informational services of the great civilian departments, in return for improved access to news and a recognition of governmental responsibility for advising and shaping, as well as informing public opinion? How should the representatives of the mass media secure access to authoritative sources of program formulation without losing vital elements of independence necessary for public perspective and understanding? To what extent should responsibility be delegated to the mass media for official public information programs, as in the earlier phases of the U. S. Overseas Information Service? Under what conditions are self-government and responsibility in the opinion industries possible so that formally representative, advisory, and consultative relationships can be worked out with governmental organs in the formulation of policy? It is extremely interesting to observe that the newspaper-radio chains which maintain the most continuous clamor about the dangers to press freedom in the growth of government public information activities are increasingly incurring the epithet of "irresponsibility" from public officials, critically thinking citizens, and publicly respected representatives of the media themselves. Irrespective of whether the charge is valid in specific cases, the question remains, how far can responsibility go without losing the public's interest in maintaining the freedom to be irresponsible from the official standpoint? Reliance upon "informal contacts" and the easy distinction between policy-making and policy-explaining are only provisional hypotheses for a tremendous field of experience in the relations between government and the mass media in the formulation and execution of public policy.

The third group of questions in this area relates to public policies that control the media in reporting and commenting upon the policies of the administration in power. Historically, it is well recognized that the mass impact of the opinion industries has replaced the political factionalism of the early "hole-in-the-wall" printing press days with a self-selected label of "independence." For this reason, helpful as content analyses and effect studies have been, it is not likely, even under cold war conditions, that the method of judicial application of quantitative standards of balanced content will become a normal technique of public control or that administrative scrutiny will be established to prevent unlabelled propagandizing in the news columns, where it is probably most effective. Starting from the standpoint of the media themselves, political analysts will focus attention on the organizations, methods, and codes that the industries develop as a matter of self-control for maintaining political neutrality, not so much as a basis for imposing public controls, but in order to understand the internal difficulties faced by the industry members in their own efforts toward self-regulation. The problem for political analysis is to identify the conditions under which the "political independence" claimed by the mass media has meaning; the issue is not so much to prove whether the media are independent or not, but to disclose the pattern of interpersonal and group relationships in the community that explain the actual position taken in the content of editorial or news reporting. As Ruth Inglis pointed out in her brilliant study of self-regulation in the movies, it may well be that the policy of "nonpartisanship" or "independence" in political controversies is only one part of the broader problem of "raising the public taste and standards of expectation"; but, even so, complicated problems of research are involved in analyzing or exposing internal differences within the opinion industries and the varying political alignments within the industry, relationships with special interest groups in the community, and relationships with public regulatory agencies (including congressional investigatory committees). In short, the task for political research into the mass media in the community is to show how public policies affecting the mass media are related to the character of political organization within the opinion industries, the impact of proposed public policies upon the various control groups within the media, and the type of arrangements provided by the media managers for leaders of both governmental and non-governmental opinion seeking public expression of their political views.

THE GOVERNMENT SECTOR OF THE AMERICAN ECONOMY*

ELMER B. STAATS

U. S. Bureau of the Budget

Americans differ in their views as to the proper role of the government in our economy. It is generally agreed, however, that government—state, local, and national—has become the most important single factor affecting the level of economic activity. The purpose here is not to discuss the arguments for or against a greater or lesser role to be played by government, but to outline the more significant ways in which this role manifests itself in our daily economic life.

The remarks which follow obviously cannot treat in detail the relationships between government and industry. They are intended rather to set forth in overall terms the importance of various governmental programs to the economy as reflected in governmental budgets at all levels. Examples and illustrations are drawn primarily from the federal budget, although the importance of governmental action upon the economy at the state and local level has been too frequently underestimated.

This paper discusses, first, the overall impact of the budget upon the economy; second, the effect of the changing emphasis in the budget upon national security programs in a peacetime period; and, third, the process through which more effective public understanding and control of governmental expenditure can be achieved.

I. HOW GOVERNMENT INFLUENCES THE ECONOMY

In discussing the government sector of the American economy, economists usually address themselves to figures indicating the total receipts and expenditures at all levels of government. These budget totals themselves tell a significant story. In the fiscal year 1952, which closed June 30, 1952, the federal government spent approximately $66 billion and collected in taxes approximately $62 billion. In the current fiscal year which began last July 1, it is estimated that federal expenditures will rise by about $8.5 billion, with tax receipts increasing by about $6.5 billion. Under the stress of defense emergency spending, the estimate for fiscal year 1954 is for a further increase in federal expenditures. Receipts are estimated at about the same level as the current fiscal year. State and local budgets in total are nearly in balance, with expenditures running at an annual rate of nearly $26 billion, and receipts at more than $24 billion. This means that government revenues at all levels in fiscal year 1953 will amount to approximately 31¢ of every dollar of national income, compared with 12¢ out of each dollar 25 years ago, and 5¢ at the beginning of the century.

* The substance of this paper was originally presented in an address before the Workshop on Economic Education, Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, Syracuse University, July 2, 1952.

These overall budget totals reflect a multitude of government activities and services affecting the economy of this nation as well as the economies of other free nations. They also reflect a demand by the electorate—irrespective of political party or political doctrine—for a steady expansion of governmental activities.

Significant as these figures are, they tell only a very small part of the story. Government activities affect economic activity in many different ways which are not fully reflected in the totals of receipts and expenditures.

Trust Funds. Budget totals leave out of account, for example, the federal government's role as a trustee for several highly important trust funds, such as the Old Age and Survivors Insurance Trust Fund, Unemployment Insurance Trust Fund, National Service Life Insurance Fund for Veterans, and the Civil Service Retirement Fund. At the present time these trust funds take in receipts of about $9.0 billion a year and pay out about $5.5 billion a year. In other words, they are receiving approximately $3.5 billion more than they pay out. While these expenditures and receipts are not legally the same as federal expenditures or direct tax receipts, they have the same kind of impact on the economy as normal budget expenditures and receipts. These transactions, which enter into what is commonly called the "cash budget," have a significant effect on the economy and certainly must receive consideration in any analysis of government expenditures.

Government Purchases. Government also affects the economy in its role as a major purchaser of goods and services. If we add the 2.6 million employees of the federal government to the approximately 4 million employees of state and local government, the total is one out of every nine employed persons in the United States working directly for the government. If we add military personnel to the total, the ratio is approximately one out of every six. Government today is also a major purchaser of commodities. For example, the federal government buys over 90 per cent of the output of the aircraft industry, about 60 per cent of the output of the electronics industry, and is the largest single purchaser of the output of the shipping industry. Government purchases of goods and services amount to more than one-fifth of the gross national product.

Grants, Loans, Guarantees, and Direct Payments. Government affects the economy in a third way by assisting various groups through grants, loans and guarantees, or through direct payments to individuals. Especially important is the ever-increasing number of examples of the government's acting to take the risk off the shoulders of private enterprise, to subsidize through low interest rates, or to "underwrite" the market. This type of action has become far-reaching, as may be seen from the following illustrations:

1. The Commodity Credit Corporation in fiscal year 1953 will make farm loans totaling $2.2 billion under the price support program.
2. The Federal National Mortgage Association has authority to purchase up to $3,650 million of mortgages insured by the Federal Housing Agency or guaranteed by the Veterans Administration. New commitments of $1.3 billion are anticipated in the fiscal year 1953. About 35 percent of the mortgages purchased will be to finance defense-housing construction.

3. The Defense Production Act authorizes three types of aid to defense industry:
 - a. Section 301 authorizes defense procurement agencies to guarantee loans to defense contractors and subcontractors. New commitments in fiscal year 1953 are estimated at $1 billion.
 - b. Section 302 authorizes the RFC and the Export-Import Bank to make direct loans and to participate in private loans for expansion of capacity, development of technological processes, or production of essential materials—available to borrowers ineligible under regular lending authority of these agencies. New commitments in 1953 will total $260 million.
 - c. Section 303 authorizes the Defense Materials Procurement Agency to guarantee minimum prices and to make advances on purchase commitments for strategic minerals and metals and industrial equipment. New commitments in 1953 will total $60 million.
4. The Veterans Administration guarantees and insures loans made by private lenders to veterans of World War II for the purchase or construction of housing. It also guarantees and insures a relatively small number of business and farm loans and makes direct housing loans to veterans in areas where guaranteed loans are not available at 4 per cent interest.
5. The Housing and Home Finance Agency makes loans and grants to communities to plan and execute projects for the elimination of slums and the redevelopment of blighted areas.
6. The Federal Housing Administration insures loans for the purchase or construction of housing through several insurance programs—for example, the new program of mortgage insurance for homes built in defense-housing areas.
7. The Rural Electrification Administration makes loans, mainly to cooperatives, to finance construction of electrical distribution, transmission, and generating facilities in rural areas. It also makes loans to finance improvements in rural telephone systems.
8. The Farmers' Home Administration makes loans for production and subsistence, for farm ownership and improvement, for farm housing, and for improvement of water facilities in semi-arid areas.
9. Federal intermediate credit banks make short-term loans to farm lending institutions to help them finance production credit needs of farmers.
10. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to make direct loans and to participate in private loans to help finance private businesses which are unable to obtain credit on reasonable terms elsewhere. Also, under the Defense Production Act, it makes loans to small businesses for defense purposes.
11. The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation insures the deposits of all banks entitled to the benefits of insurance under the Federal Deposit Insurance Act. To protect depositors it may also make loans to or purchase assets from the insured banks when such loans or purchases will facilitate a merger or consolidation and will reduce the probable loss to the Corporation. It makes loans and purchases assets to prevent the closing of an insured bank or to re-open a closed insured bank.
12. The Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation guarantees the safety of savings and credited earnings up to $10,000 for each investor's account in an insured institution. It makes loans to, purchases assets of, or contributes to, insured institutions to prevent their default or to restore them to normal operation.
13. Under the tax amortization program, businessmen may "write-off" certain amounts of the cost of expansion of their businesses for government defense work by charging such expansion to "business expenses" for tax purposes.
14. The Public Housing Administration is authorized to make loans and grants to assist local housing authorities to construct 135,000 low-rent public housing units annually over a six-year period.

Many other examples could be added to this list. The programs mentioned, however, will provide financial assistance totaling nearly $17.5 billion to business firms and individuals in the fiscal year 1953. These programs have little direct effect on expenditures since they are reflected in the budget only on a net cost basis, but their economic effect is obviously great.

Unlike the above programs, direct payments or subsidies to business, farmers, and other groups have a substantial effect on expenditures. Payments to farmers for soil conservation practices, subsidies to the merchant marine and the airlines, aid to the newspapers in the form of subsidized postal rates, grants to local communities through navigation and river and harbor and flood control work—these are but a few illustrations of direct federal payments which have an important effect on the economy.

Probably most controversial are payments to individuals under various social security and welfare programs. These payments include old-age and survivors insurance, unemployment benefits, and railroad retirement benefits—which are financed out of trust funds—and public assistance benefits, which are included in the budget totals. Taken together, these payments amounted to $4.2 billion in 1950, and are estimated at $5.3 billion in the current year. The economic effects of these payments are far-reaching, in terms of the number of people who benefit directly from them. For example, the average number of persons receiving public assistance in the current year is estimated at nearly 4.9 million, and about 5 million will receive OASI benefits.

Federal benefit payments to veterans also reach and affect the economic behavior of many people. This year, more than 700,000 veterans will receive education and training benefits, and more than 3 million veterans and their dependents will receive compensation and pensions. Total payments will amount to about $3 billion.

Other direct payments are made, of course, to the several million persons covered by the employee retirement systems operated by federal, state and local governments.

Through its own hospitals and out-patient clinics, the federal government provides medical services and hospital care that are available in some measure to more than 25 million people. Included in this eligible group are 20 million war veterans; 3½ million officers and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, and Air Force, and certain of their dependents; 400,000 American Indians and the Eskimos and other natives of Alaska; and nearly 20,000 persons in federal institutions. The federal government operates more than 500 hospitals, which have nearly 20 per cent of all the hospital beds in the United States. In addition, the armed forces maintain many hospitals overseas.

Regardless of what one thinks of the political or social implications of the programs outlined above, their economic effect of stabilizing purchasing power is generally conceded.

Government Enterprises. The government affects the economy in another way by directly operating many enterprises producing goods and services. In the current fiscal year the Tennessee Valley Authority, for example, will add new capital investment of $267 million and will spend $122 million for operating expenses. The Post Office Department, the largest single business operation in the country, will spend nearly $3 billion.

Regulatory Activities. Through government regulation of the economy, moreover, the government has undertaken programs to protect consumers by controlling certain monopoly-type industries such as power, transportation, and communications. It also has undertaken to protect the consumer through programs such as the Food and Drug Administration, the Federal Trade Commission, and the Securities and Exchange Commission, and other regulatory activities. While these programs involve only a small percentage of total budget expenditures, they have far-reaching effects upon the entire economy.

Taxation. Finally, there is the matter of taxation. Besides the amount of taxation, the kind of tax and the manner of its collection are also significant. Every time government spends money, it provides purchasing power for someone; every time it levies taxes, it takes purchasing power away from someone. Whether these revenues are obtained from taxes on individuals, from taxes on corporations, or from excises, or from borrowing, it affects not only the future of individuals and businesses but also the general stability of our monetary and credit structure.

II. THE POSTWAR BUDGET

The above classification of governmental activity—and many other such classifications might be made—has only one purpose, to provide a better understanding of how government activities affect our economic life. A somewhat more controversial subject is the purposes or objectives which government programs are designed to achieve. This, of course, goes to the heart of the issue of what the government should and should not do.

Governmental activities at all levels have increased sharply in the past fifty years, and I believe that government will continue to play an increasingly important part in our lives, regardless of the political party in control. Whatever may be the motivating factors, the pressures to increase the size and number of activities of government appear to be greater than those which seek to reduce them. I believe it can be safely assumed that government will never again occupy the relatively minor role it played in the economic life of the nation twenty or thirty years ago. The problem confronting us, therefore, is agreement, first upon objectives and, second, on how the machinery of government can be improved to best serve our common needs.

The dominant factor today is the need for national security. In the fiscal year which started July 1, it is estimated that total expenditures will reach nearly $75 billion. More than seventy per cent of this total, or roughly $53 billion, will be required for six major national security programs—military services, international security and foreign relations, atomic energy development, civil defense, ship building, and defense production. Thus, it can be seen that all but approximately $21 billion of total federal expenditures this year will be the direct result of programs designed to deal with the problem of communist aggression. More than one-half of the remaining $21 billion will be required to pay the costs of past wars, in the form of veterans' services and benefits, and interest on the national debt, most of which was created during World War II. This leaves about $10 billion out of the total expenditure of $75 billion for all other federal services.

Paradoxically enough, this $10 billion is the area against which the charges of big government and bureaucracy are most frequently hurled. This is the area, also, to which those who would balance the budget frequently direct their attention.

It can be appreciated how keen the competition is for a greater share of the limited dollars available. We emerged from World War II with a relatively large military program and new international responsibilities, both designed to preserve our national security in the uncertain postwar world. We emerged with a debt more than five times greater than before the war, costing us more than $5 billion annually in interest alone. We emerged with 15 million new veterans, many needing hospitalization and eligible for readjustment training and education benefits. These new and enlarged programs created a new base for the federal budget—a base five times greater than it had been a decade before. Consider also that during the war our domestic programs had been virtually closed down. Our economy had been expanding, science and technology had made tremendous strides, and our population had grown, but during these years we had been building up an ever-increasing backlog of needs—needs for more housing, for improved highways, for increased medical research and training, for new natural resource developments, for more adequate measures of social welfare and security. Thus, one of the great problems facing the federal government during the postwar years has been the achievement of an adequate domestic program within the limited number of available dollars.

Yet even within this segment of the budget, only slightly more than one-half is subject to re-allocation or reduction through the normal budgetary process. Much of it is committed for meeting such relatively fixed and predetermined obligations of the government as the contributions to retirement funds for railroad workers and government employees, the recurrent postal deficit, and agricultural price support. This part of the budget provides also for practically all the $3 billion of grants to state and local governments under existing laws—among them the annual grants of more than $1 billion for public assistance and more than one-half billion dollars for highways and airports, as well as the grants for hospital construction for which actual expenditures in the current fiscal year will exceed $100 million. Moreover, this $10 billion for civilian domestic programs includes numerous items which have direct and obvious relationships to the defense effort, including defense power projects, internal security, and protection of harbors and ports.

When part of the $10 billion is set aside for relatively fixed commitments, open-end grants, and obvious defense-related items, civilian domestic programs subject to significant annual revisions constitute a relatively small part of the $75 billion total of expenditures for the fiscal year 1953.

In referring to the limited funds available for civilian or domestic programs in the budget, I do not mean to imply that there is any fixed or arbitrary total available for these programs from year to year. Nothing could be further from the truth. Each individual program must be weighed and compared with a multitude of other programs in terms of its potential importance to the nation as well as its short-run contribution to defense needs and essential civilian requirements. In our rapidly expanding defense economy, the government's jobs of providing postal service, operating the federal airways, patrolling the borders, or collecting taxes and customs get bigger, not smaller. In other fields, the government's efforts must be redirected so that housing, the protection of health, and the operation of schools are particularly assured in critical defense areas.

All these factors have a bearing upon our ability to manage the budget so as to achieve the broad fiscal policies necessary to promote growth and stability in our economy. Most economists now appear to be in some degree of agreement with the principle of compensatory fiscal policy. That is, during depression periods they believe that the government should either spend more, tax less, or both, and that in inflationary periods, on the other hand, the government should tax more and spend less. In effect this means that during depression periods the government is adding purchasing power to the income stream and during inflationary periods it is withdrawing purchasing power from the income stream. Thus, the government tends to compensate for the ups and downs of the business sector of the economy. We must recognize, of course, that there are many practical limitations to this principle. For example, during periods of international tension, such as the present, government spending is determined largely by national security needs. As a result, the fiscal program of the government cannot fully compensate for the economic pressures generated by increases in government demand. During World War II and following the North Korean aggression, the Congress found it necessary to impose direct controls as a means of restraining inflationary pressures.

The Committee for Economic Development has suggested that budgetary policy be based upon a stable structure of taxes and a stable structure of expenditures, endeavoring to achieve a balance at a reasonably high level of employment, allowing surpluses to occur in booms and deficits to occur in depressions. Unfortunately, when we have a fairly large surplus, as in 1948, there is a strong temptation to reduce tax rates and initiate new programs. So it is very difficult to adhere to a policy that involves relying upon the automatic impact of changing levels of business activity.

Most of us have come to realize that in a period of severe deflation it is not in the best interests of the nation to attempt to balance the budget. Any attempt to balance the budget at a time when national income sharply declines will prove self-defeating, because the very attempt to take out more taxes from the pockets of consumers who have lower incomes than they had before reduces still further the amount they have to spend and aggravates the economic decline. This used to be a radical idea, but it is becoming an accepted fact.

For example, in 1949 a special subcommittee on monetary credit and fiscal policy of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report, headed by Senator Douglas, after extensive studies explicitly recognized that annual budget balancing was not a feasible objective in all types of economic conditions.

We have to strive for some kind of a budgetary balance over a longer period, recognizing that deficits are inevitable in depressions and periods of national tension. It would be convenient if we could stop at this point and simply say, "budgetary policy stimulates the economy when we have deficits and slows down inflation when we have surpluses." But the fact is that a balanced budget can readily be either inflationary or deflationary. The economic effect varies depending on the specific kinds of expenditures and taxes, i.e., what income groups pay the taxes, or what income groups get the bulk of the benefits from the expenditures.

With respect to expenditures, payments for public assistance grants, for example, will give a far more direct stimulus to the economy than payment of interest on the public debt, which goes chiefly to financial institutions or relatively high income groups. With respect to revenues, to take an extreme case again, a sales tax, or an excise tax, will retard business much more than will an estate tax, the effect of which is very indirect and not too definable.

In measuring the economic impact of federal financial transactions, the so-called "consolidated cash budget"—which reflects the actual flow of money between the government and the public—is regarded by many economists as a better tool than the conventional budget. The consolidated cash budget includes the transactions between the trust funds and the public, which are not reflected in the conventional budget. Since the trust funds have been taking in more money than they have been paying out—building reserves for future liabilities—the difference between the cash budget figures and the conventional budget figures is substantial. For example, in the seven postwar fiscal years 1947 through 1953, the conventional budget shows a deficit estimated at $2.2 billion, while the "cash" budget shows a surplus estimated at $20 billion.

III. CONTROL OF GOVERNMENTAL EXPENDITURES

Among the governmental mechanisms through which these various types of needs are evaluated and determined, the most important is the annual budget process.

There is a general misconception of the kind of information necessary to evaluate a federal budget. The size, scope, and direction of the President's budget are not determined by a multitude of unrelated decisions reached on individual items and activities. The question of how much money is needed to run a given activity efficiently has to be asked about every budget request, but it is not the major decision that has to be made—and even this question cannot be decided on a piecemeal basis. More basic is the question whether each activity shall be conducted at all, and if so at what level. For any particular program, this question can be answered only in the perspective of such broad considerations as the general outlook for expenditures and revenues, economic trends, the requirements of law, and many other factors.

These are the kinds of questions encountered again and again in the preparation of the budget. Long before detailed estimates are prepared by the agencies, meetings have been held to identify problems and discuss the prospects for each major program, forecasts have been prepared to indicate the probable totals of revenues and expenditures and their relationship to the general economic outlook, appropriation ceilings have been determined for the larger agencies, and general policies have been defined. The agency requests are reviewed in the light of these basic decisions and policies as well as the requirements of existing law. Such considerations determine the broad outlines of the President's budget.

Certainly the Congress in its review of the budget should bring to bear, both with respect to the total and each individual part, all possible information that will help it to obtain a full understanding and independent judgment of the budget requests submitted by the President. I am inclined to think, however, that this is not simply a matter of increasing the quantity of information placed before the Congress. Instead, it would seem to be a matter of the relevance of information. That is to say, instead of knowing more about the lesser detail of budgetary proposals, the Congress might want to know more about the issues and problems that determine the budget in its main elements and as a whole.

Fortunately, the Congress already has available for its use a sizeable amount of information which has a direct bearing upon the budget and the major considerations which underlie it. This available information includes the estimates and justifications presented to the Appropriations Committees; the detailed work of the staffs of the Appropriations Committees; the valuable audit reports, as well as other reports and data, of the General Accounting Office; the various reports produced by the staff of the Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Expenditures; similar reports from the staff of the House Committee on Expenditures; the factual research available through the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress; the information pertaining to the budget developed by the Joint Committee on the Economic Report; the technical work of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation; and the factual data furnished by the Bureau of the Budget.

Of great importance in any consideration of expenditure control is the review of the fiscal effects—the effects upon subsequent budgets—of authorizing legislation which is introduced and considered at any given session of Congress. At present, such a review is not systematically and uniformly provided in either house. It would seem fundamental that in appraising legislation from the standpoint of public policy, the Congress should do so with as full a knowledge as is possible of its effect upon the future fiscal position of the government.

A careful budget review, however, is not enough. We need to review again the question of improved legislative procedures at all levels of government. While there have been many improvements, the roll calls and quorum calls in the national Congress still take up 10 per cent of the entire time of that body. The Congress last year enacted a total of 411 private relief bills—nearly twice as many private bills as public bills—many of which could have been handled under a delegation to the executive branch. We need higher salaries and better staff for members of our legislative bodies. What we particularly need is a careful reexamination of the machinery for the review of fiscal policy and the budget. We must also find additional ways to improve the organization and management of the administrative agencies. I think that we need to establish from time to time a commission along the lines of the Hoover Commission. No commission in itself can provide a simple formula for economies or reductions in the budget, but it can provide the basis for better public understanding of the problem, an understanding which is the essential prerequisite to major reforms or improvements in the administration of governmental programs. We need to provide better incentives for employees through awards, through more adequate salaries, and through improvements in the merit system.

Finally, steps should be taken to increase citizen interest and participation in government. No document has more implications for all of our people than the budget itself. Yet, for the fiscal year 1952 only 1,000 copies of the Budget Document were distributed to the public. This means that for a state the size of Ohio not more than 50 copies of the budget were available. Three years ago the Bureau of the Budget began the publication annually of The Federal Budget in Brief, a small document of less than 50 pages, in which it has undertaken through the simple devices of charts, tables, and short narrative descriptions to present the basic facts with respect to where the money is spent and where it comes from. The response to this document has been excellent, but we still need to make available to the public more factual data. There is still too much misinformation with respect to the budget, some of it coming from individuals and groups who have not been too careful to set down the facts clearly. In most cases, however, it has come from individuals who do not understand the complex make-up of this important document.

The experience of the Bureau of the Budget over several decades demonstrates that there can be no simple, easy, single-shot approach to economy, efficiency, and restraint in the fiscal operations of the government. This is a goal that has to be achieved through continuous, unremitting, intensive review of both the operations and the programs. The operations must be watched to see that they are managed carefully and competently. The programs must be watched to see that they are the right programs, each in a balanced relationship to the rest of the government program and to the economy as a whole. There is no single answer to the question of controlling expenditures—there can be only a series of separate, considered judgments on a series of individual items. It is most important that these shall be well-informed judgments, consistent with one another and with the general military, fiscal, and economic situation.

SOME ASPECTS OF THE SECURITY PROBLEM IN THE MIDDLE EAST*

HALFORD L. HOSKINS

Library of Congress

On April 4, 1949, the representatives of twelve European and American nations, assembled in Washington, D. C., affixed their signatures to an instrument called the North Atlantic Treaty. This was the crucial step in the formation of one of the most impressive alliances ever entered into by sovereign states. The pact bore testimony to the rise of a new menace in the world, a menace spearheaded by a specious form of communism and powered by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, whose postwar activities left to the free nations no practicable alternative other than to seek safety in a regional collective security pact.

The North Atlantic Alliance, as its name implied, was designed primarily to make provision for the defense, in time of emergency, of the nations grouped about the North Atlantic basin. The logic in this lay in the circumstance that about the shores of this oceanic basin were grouped most of the nations whose industrial potentials and whose institutions constituted the only serious challenge to world domination by the Soviet Union. Certainly in April, 1949 the Soviet threat was not confined to the North Atlantic area, nor was the pact confined to those limits. The inclusion of France in the alliance necessarily involved the inclusion also of its Algerian department. Strategically speaking, France—with Algeria—represented the Mediterranean approximately as much as it did the North Atlantic area. Italy also was embraced by the treaty. Largely shut off from other parts of continental Europe by the Alps and situated well away from the North Atlantic area, Italy was definitely Mediterranean in character. Thus, the North Atlantic Pact contained within its own original structure evidence to the effect that security in the North Atlantic area called for defense arrangements at least in the western Mediterranean. This was tacit recognition of the fact that, in the contemporary world, security is indivisible. It reflected the realization that security in the North Atlantic or in any other specific area necessitates coming to grips with a world menace wherever it may choose to appear. Indeed, no sooner was the North Atlantic Alliance a functioning organization than it was faced with the necessity of extending the bounds of its direct concern eastward to embrace other Soviet pressure areas.

Historically, imperial Russia, whose mantle of external policy now is worn so fittingly by the Soviet Union, aimed at expansion southward—toward the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf—rather more consistently than in any other direction. Since 1696, when the expanding realm of the Tsars reached the northern shores of the Black Sea and incorporated the town and port of Azov, one of the most persistent themes in international relations has been supplied by the efforts of this great northern power to reach the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf on its own terms. Except for the timely assistance rendered to the waning Ottoman and Persian Empires by Great Britain, sometimes reinforced by other European states, the political map outlines of southern Europe, southern Asia and parts of Africa indubitably would not have been those now familiar to us.

Until after the North Atlantic Pact had begun to function, the United States had no coordinated policy applicable to the Middle East as a whole. Its previous postwar contacts with that area had taken the form of ad hoc measures not yet bound up with long range national policy. While undoubtedly it had been conditioned to respond to needs arising beyond the defined limits of the Atlantic Pact by having participated in the development of a wartime supply route to Russia through Iran and in the final campaigns in North Africa and the Mediterranean, the assumption by the United States of responsibilities within this area resulted from the practical requirements of leadership in the postwar world. In its efforts to establish situations of strength in the Middle East, the United States was under the necessity at the outset of proceeding more or less in the role of deputy of the powers which, although enfeebled by war, still maintained recognizable spheres of influence in the area. France and Italy no longer maintained important holds on the Levant, but the residual interests of Great Britain were still extensive. As early as 1946, before any serious thought had been given to the need for a North Atlantic Alliance, Soviet and satellite pressures on Greece, Turkey and Iran led to the granting of emergency forms of United States economic assistance to those states. The British announcement in February, 1947 that, owing to a disastrous state of economic affairs at home, all forms of British support for Greece would have to be suspended at once, called for American policy decisions of a more fundamental sort. Time being of the essence, hasty conferences of American political and military chiefs ended in the conclusion that, on security grounds alone, the United States could not afford the risks involved in an extension of the Soviet sphere to the Mediterranean. "It must be the foreign policy of the United States," said President Truman, "to support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressures. . . ."

The pronouncement, coupled with a request to the Congress for an appropriation of $400 million for military and economic aid to Greece and Turkey and authorization for the sending of technical missions to those countries, opened up a new era in the relations of the United States with outposts of the Middle East. Although primarily defensive in character and limited for the time being as to geographical area of application, the doctrine set forth for congressional approval contained overtones that were neither defensive nor local in character. Practically speaking, an ultimatum had been issued. While it contained more of bravado than of promise, since little or no military force could then have been mustered in support of it, the President's pronouncement was a precursor of successive steps each of which was more far-reaching than the last, until the United States was deeply committed for the whole of the Middle East.

Further aid for Greece and Turkey—and incidentally Iran—was continued in 1948. In October, 1949 came the enactment of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act, conceived as a means of promoting the interests of the free world apart from, but in relation to, other forms of assistance to the same end, namely, the Economic Recovery Program, the Point Four or Technical Assistance Program, and the North Atlantic Treaty program. By the Mutual Security Act of 1951 all of the methods previously developed for the promotion of the security interests of the United States and its allies were brought into closer relationship. Under this Act, for the fiscal years 1952 and 1953, sums totaling more than $13 billion were appropriated. Of this, substantial amounts were earmarked for direct aid of one kind or another not only to Greece, Turkey and Iran, but also to Egypt, Iraq, Jordan, Lebanon, Syria, Saudi Arabia, Yemen and Israel. It was natural that the assumption of these responsibilities of an economic nature were followed, as need arose, by political responsibilities, as well.

British policy in this area, meanwhile, had reached a state of bankruptcy. It rested still, as in earlier times, on a lively realization that the Middle East is strategically vital as the barrier between the Soviet Union and the earth's richest oil regions, the vast resources of the African continent, and the major routes of communication to South and East Asia and to the commonwealths in the antipodes. At the close of World War II, British Ministers believed that, despite many wartime changes, British influence in the area could be maintained through two organizational channels: the Arab League, reinforced by treaties with Egypt, Iraq and Transjordan, as the political and military basis of stability; and the Middle East Supply Center, as an agency through which depressed populations might be brought with economic aid to the stage of development where "princes and pashas" could be dispensed with. Within the next five years these assumptions were found to be fallacious. Owing particularly to troubles growing out of a "National Home for the Jewish People" in Palestine, the Arab League, originally formed under British sponsorship, became embittered and ineffectual. Egypt, the bell-wether of the group, inaugurated a campaign aimed at the canceling of the 1936 treaty and the ousting of the British from both the Suez Canal zone and the Sudan. The Middle East agency in these circumstances met only with frustration.

The single source of hope in attaining British Middle East objectives in the future thus appeared to lie in the growing disposition of the United States to share in British aims and objectives and to make available both the financial and the physical means for the implementation of policy. Obviously this would call for close Anglo-American understanding and cooperation in building up the economies and the military strength of the Middle East states, in reducing the animosities growing out of the Arab-Israel war, in resettling the Arab refugees, and in creating conditions in which forms of aid could be made acceptable to the indigenous populations. It would also call for a miracle: the miracle that, even if British and American objectives should prove to be substantially the same, complete agreement and cooperation could be maintained as to the methods to be employed in pursuing them. British Government heads must have been aware of the risks inherent in seeking cooperation from a powerful ally far removed from and relatively a stranger to the scene of action—an ally, moreover, upon whom the United Kingdom was largely dependent for its own economic recovery. Yet the only visible alternative would have been to withdraw as completely from the whole of the Middle East area as had been the withdrawal from Greece in 1947 and Palestine in 1948. To the extent that hope still remains that the countries of the Middle East can be retained within the sphere of influence of the free world, the course chosen by the British would appear to have been judicious. The event has borne out the usual human experience, however, that miracles are extremely rare and can not confidently be counted upon.

It was natural that, once having absorbed the British doctrine that no comprehensive plan of security would be effectual without some provision for the Middle East, American planners should plunge boldly into schemes for incorporating that area into western defense plans. They were the less restrained in their efforts to achieve desired results in an unfamiliar environment because of a rather widely prevalent suspicion that the British, because of preoccupation in characteristic ways with their own national interests, had failed signally to maintain an adequate working basis for a mutual security scheme.

Illustrative of contrasting views was the case of Turkish-Greek candidacy for full membership in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. At the time of the signing of the North Atlantic Treaty the Greek and Turkish foreign ministers expressed the hope that a comparable Mediterranean pact might be formed to extend the zone of joint defense into the Middle East. The western powers did not view that proposal as practicable, but in the autumn of 1950 both Turkey and Greece were made consultants to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization on matters of Mediterranean defense. As the Korean war progressed, however, Turkey became increasingly concerned over its exposed position on the frontier of the Soviet Union and inaugurated a campaign aimed at achieving full membership in NATO. Similar representations were made by Greece. United States officials, coming more and more to regard Turkey as a cornerstone in any comprehensive scheme for the security of the free world, reached the conclusion in the early months of 1951 that it would be the part of wisdom to accede to Turkish wishes. This conclusion was stoutly opposed at first by several members of the Alliance, notably by Great Britain. British spokesmen pointed out that the Treaty of Mutual Assistance of October 19, 1939 between Great Britain, France and Turkey contained such assurances for Turkey as were needed from the West. They submitted that the proper role for Turkey was to serve as the keystone in a Middle East, not a North Atlantic, defense structure. These arguments did not weigh heavily with Turkish leaders nor with their American sponsors. When, in September, the Atlantic Pact Council met in Ottawa, representatives of the United States were able to secure a unanimous agreement that both Turkey and Greece should be invited to join the Pact. In February, 1952 the formalities of extending the Pact were concluded. At the latitude of Istanbul the defense zone jointly guarded by fourteen states then extended three-fifths of the distance around the globe.

The eastward extension of the Atlantic Pact into the Middle East by way of Greece and Turkey did not end the differences in the points of view of the two principal Allies on Middle East issues. The efforts to provide for the military defense of the area not infrequently provided occasions for the display of contrasting views arising from differences in experience, in criteria, in analyses of situations, in methods of approach, and—to some extent—even in objectives. This is well illustrated by efforts to apply the "strategic concept" of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to the southern flank of the European defense area. Both political and military considerations were bound up in the lively controversy concerning the high command of NATO forces in the Mediterranean corridor. This question, no doubt, had been implicit all along in the extent to which naval power and naval bases in the Mediterranean and British commitments in the countries of the Middle East entered into the objectives and the calculations of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The issue first became acute in March, 1951 upon United States insistence that an American naval officer be given the principal naval command in the Mediterranean—a proposal stoutly resisted by British authorities. The latter argued that British naval tradition called for leadership in Mediterranean waters and that, since NATO defense plans in the Middle East area rested to a very large extent on British treaty relations with Middle East states, it was essential that a British officer be placed in chief command for reasons of prestige, if no other. United States spokesmen contended, however, that American security interests in the Mediterranean had become second to none, that only an American supreme commander in the area could prevent jealous rivalry with the French and Italians, and that an American officer could work the more effectively with supreme headquarters in Paris. The decision substantially in favor of the United States contention after many months of wrangling was in keeping with United States sponsorship of Greece and Turkey for Atlantic Pact membership and with measures being taken for American development and equipment of British and French bases in North Africa, the Mediterranean and in the Middle East countries.

On February 1, 1951 it was announced that the United States, on the basis of studies by the NATO military committee, had requested permission from Great Britain to station war planes—fighters and bombers alike—at fourteen British airfields in the Mediterranean and Middle East. As far as the British Government was concerned, there was no lack of willingness to accord facilities to the United States at any airfields or ports under their control anywhere within the defense area. But Britain was sovereign only at Gibraltar, Malta and Cyprus. Other bases were held under the terms of treaties and agreements with the indigenous states. Consequently, whatever its virtues as a feature of the strategic concept for the Middle East, the announced plan could not quickly be realized. Egypt already had determined upon the liquidation of British bases in that country. Iraq was fearful that the use of treaty bases in that country might provoke retaliation by Russia. Jordan had become increasingly disposed to place strict limits on its treaty concessions to Britain. King Ibn Saud was hesitant with respect to the further development by the United States of the air installations at the Dhahran base in the heart of the Persian Gulf oil area, originally constructed during World War II. In February, 1951 he was willing to agree only to a six months' extension of American privileges at that place. Israel already was on record as opposed to any foreign controlled and operated base within its borders. The Turkish Government, too, had concluded that, while advanced air bases ought to be constructed and fully equipped, it would be impolitic in time of peace to place their control in the hands of a western power. Under these circumstances, there was no lack of agreement between British and American planners with respect to the great need for the further extension of a defense system that would contain strategically located, defensible positions which would be available to at least one of the great powers for a considerable time to come under any foreseeable conditions.

The need for a well-knit Middle East defense organization beyond the expanded periphery of the Atlantic Pact obviously was called for. As the Arab-Israel war had amply demonstrated, this was not to be looked for in the Arab League. However, as Greece and Turkey came to receive guarantees of aid from the West and were accorded associate, and finally full, membership in the Atlantic Pact, the Arab states gave thought to the steps which they might be able to take independently with any prospect of acquiring from western countries the arms and armaments which they so conspicuously lacked. In October, 1949 the Political Committee of the Arab League reported agreement on the principle of setting up a new Arab collective security pact and Egypt presently assumed the task of enlisting the members of the League in this undertaking. While this was accomplished in the course of the next three years, the western powers could glean little satisfaction from the fact inasmuch as the principal objective of the new military association so clearly was the creation of a stronger united front against Israel rather than the resistance of aggression from the Soviet Union.

The closing of the security gap between Turkey and the eastern shores of the Mediterranean, on the west, and the Himalayas, flanked by Pakistan and India, on the east, thus called for an area organization along lines quite different from those of the Arab security pact. In this the guidance and support of the NATO powers, specifically including both Great Britain and the United States, and provisions for the inclusion at some point of Israel and Iran as well as the Arab states, would be indispensable. From these considerations emerged the idea for a new Middle East association which might enable Great Britain to find a satisfactory solution for the continuing controversy with Egypt over the former's retention of a base in the Suez Canal zone and bring Egypt—and, by implication, the entire Arab group of states—within the western defense perimeter.

The idea materialized in the shape of two formal instruments, drafts of which were transmitted to the Egyptian Government on October 14, 1951. The first of these was a four-power proposal by the United States, the United Kingdom, France and Turkey for an Allied Middle East Command. "Egypt belongs to the free world," ran the introductory section, "and in consequence her defense and that of the Middle East in general is equally vital to other democratic nations." In the pact envisaged, Egypt was to occupy a place of equality with the proponents. Australia, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa were to be associated with the organization and provision was made for a relationship—undefined—with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. A technical annex to this document outlined the circumstances under which, in the event of Egyptian acceptance of the proposal, Great Britain would be prepared to hand over to Egypt its bases held under the treaty of 1936. The second draft instrument conveyed by the British Government consisted of proposals with respect to means of reaching an Anglo-Egyptian agreement on the future administration of the Sudan and the use of the Nile waters.

It quickly became apparent that in tendering these proposals the powers had reckoned without their host. A more untimely moment, in view of the temper of Egypt, could hardly have been found. Failure to include that state in the preliminary discussions leading to the four-power proposal proved to have been a serious blunder. These errors, in Egyptian eyes, were compounded by assurances given to Israel at the same time that, in the working out of the Middle East Command, Israeli interests would be duly cared for and by ill-timed statements by the British Governor General of the Sudan with respect to his intention of resisting any unilateral attempt to alter the working of the Sudanese Condominium. Egyptian response to the joint overture, consequently, was instantaneous and dramatic: the four-power proposal was rejected outright. Within another twenty-four hours the Egyptian Parliament had unanimously adopted measures abrogating the treaties under which Great Britain held sway in the Sudan and maintained bases in the Suez Canal zone. A train of events had been put in motion which resulted presently in armed clashes and in complete frustration for the time being of the Middle East security plans of the western powers.

To have accepted this defeat as final would have been to jettison an important part of the comprehensive program on which the security, possibly the survival, of the free world depended. Consequently, on October 24, 1951, a Department of State announcement gave notice of the intent of the United States to establish a Middle East defense command regardless of Egypt's refusal to join. Plans were being worked out, this stated, for the cooperation in this task of the United States, Britain, France, Turkey, New Zealand, Australia and the Union of South Africa. Once plans were complete, invitations to membership might be extended to the Arab states and Israel. This statement was amplified on November 10 by the publication of an eleven-point statement by the Big Three powers and Turkey purporting to be the framework of a program determined upon to secure the Middle East against "outside aggression." This four-power plan as issued was "a peculiar document drafted to meet a peculiar situation." It was studiously vague on various points, notably on any relationship that the Command might bear to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. However, as it coincided with the inauguration of a $160 million program of economic and technical aid to Middle East countries, it may have contributed momentarily to the hampering of renewed efforts on the part of Egypt to vitalize the Arab security pact.

During the succeeding months one plan modification after another, originating in London or in Washington and generally representing joint consultations, was brought forward in the not-overly-confident hope that one might prove to be acceptable to Egypt and the Arab states. By August, 1952 the Americans were disposed to discard plans for a "command," implying the concentration in the area of armed forces, in favor of a defense "organization" with functions limited to liaison with the native states and consultation on matters of defense. The British preferred a "going concern" as one more likely to bring in the Arab states and Israel than any paper scheme. The upshot was a partial compromise. The Middle East Command project was abandoned in favor of a Middle East Defense Organization sponsored by the United States, Great Britain, France and Turkey, together with Australia, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa. MEDO, consisting essentially of a committee of generals to plan the defenses of the area, would be concerned also with the issues making for instability.

A significant feature of the plan as made public was the British proposal to establish MEDO headquarters on the island of Cyprus. No clearer indication could have been given of the importance attached to the eventual inclusion of Egypt in the Organization and of the necessity of making fundamental concessions to that end. Obviously little was to be gained from the continuation of a feud which necessitated the retention of large armed forces at considerable cost in the Suez Canal zone for possible employment against the Egyptians themselves. Intimations already had been given that, once Sudan matters had been settled satisfactorily, British forces would be withdrawn by stages from the Canal zone. As the year 1952 passed along it became increasingly probable that, as a central base for Allied operations in the Middle East, the Suez Canal zone would prove to be more of a handicap than an asset. However determined the British may have been at an earlier period to retain the base, its evacuation had become a matter of time and opportunity. Since the Egyptians could not have misinterpreted these indications, their unwillingness to defer to British representations on Sudan issues is readily understandable. Time clearly was on the side of Egypt in the Anglo-Egyptian controversy. Hope was not abandoned for MEDO, meanwhile, although the outlook for the inclusion of both the Arab states and Israel in any defense organization in which the western powers would be entitled to introduce military forces into the area in time of emergency admittedly is bleak.

In both World War I and World War II the strategic bearing of the Middle East on power issues elsewhere in the world was clearly demonstrated. In both conflicts the western allies possessed bases and starting points within the area itself. In both these proved to be of vital importance in shaping the outcome. Seven years after the close of World War II, with a cold war pointing the way toward a possible third world war, none of the western powers possessed a secure foothold on continental ground within the area. Apart from Turkey, which had unqualifiedly cast its lot with the West, the Allied powers could count on little aid of any kind from within the area itself, and this at a time when Middle East oil resources had become vital to any plan of free world defense. Iran, which not too willingly had played a prominent part in enabling the Soviet Union to stem the German onslaught in World War II, had become essentially a hostile country; almost as likely to contribute to the advance of communist power as to be of any service to the free world. The treaty relationships which still subsisted between Great Britain and Egypt, Iraq and Jordan were of increasingly doubtful value as time passed. In these and in most of the other Arab states dislike of the West appeared to be gaining over fears of the designs of Communist Russia. The fact that Israel had decided in some circumstances to cast its lot with the West might one day prove to be fortunate. In the meantime, its very existence had much to do with the major problems confronting the Allies in the area.

Under these circumstances, Allied strategy as applied to the Middle East has required further examination. One of the leading questions necessarily brought under consideration has had to do with the extent to which Cyprus can be made to serve as a main base and pivotal point in a defense system in place of the Suez Canal zone. In this respect Cyprus does possess certain advantages, some not foreseen when Great Britain took over the island from Ottoman rule in 1878 as a "place d'armes." Its principal claim to virtue as a base, of course, lies in the fact that it is the only bit of territory now possessed by any of the western Allies within the compass of the Middle East which can be held indefinitely without serious injury to relations with any state or group of states. Its fitness for use as a principal military-naval base is reasonably good. Upon the expenditure of substantial sums on harbor works, the ancient port of Famagusta is becoming an acceptable substitute for Alexandria in Egypt and for Haifa, once in British-mandated Palestine, now in Israel. The median plain and the dry climate of Cyprus make it adaptable as an air base. Its geographical location, too, is advantageous with respect to possible objectives in time of war. Moscow is only 1500 air miles distant; Baku, the Soviet oil center on the Caspian Sea, lies only 1000 miles away; Rostov, a main industrial center on the Don River, is distant 900 miles; Sverdlovsk, a new center of Soviet heavy industry in the Ural Mountains, can be reached at a distance of 2000 miles; the oilfields of Rumania are as near as 800 miles.

There are serious limitations in the plan of substituting Cyprus for the Suez Canal zone, however. Its principal shortcoming lies in the fact that under no imaginable circumstances can it effectively protect and control the Suez Canal itself. The complete withdrawal of British armed forces and technical personnel from immediate proximity to the waterway, if carried out, thus will necessarily open up an entirely new era in the strategic calculations of western countries. British protection and political control of the Canal, after all, have been essentially of an international nature. Under the nine-power Suez Canal Convention of 1888 and an accompanying reservation, Great Britain to all intents and purposes became the agent of the world community for the political supervision of the waterway, a position still provided for in the 20-year Anglo-Egyptian Treaty of 1936. It is inconceivable that the transfer of guardianship to Egypt, to be followed within a relatively few years by complete control of the commercial operations now carried on by the Suez Canal Company, would insure to the same extent the uninterrupted use of the Canal at all times, even if Egypt should become a member of a western-sponsored Middle East defense organization. Already there have been significant instances of Egyptian interference with Canal traffic where national interests were conceived to have been concerned. The transformation of the Suez Canal from a principal intercontinental maritime highway into a territorial waterway inevitably will give local national interests a priority over those of the international community.

Thus, the assumption of complete control of the Suez waterway by Egypt potentially will add thousands of miles—the additional distance involved in passage by way of the Cape of Good Hope—to the maritime distance between points west and points east of the Isthmus of Suez for naval operations and for commercial traffic alike. In view of the possible interruption of oil transportation by pipeline from the great Iraq fields or from the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean owing to political upheavals or military operations, any limitations placed on the unrestricted commercial use of the Suez Canal instantly will affect the security of the industrial countries of western Europe whose economies are linked so closely with fuel supplies from the Middle East. But the erection of any barriers at the Suez Canal has other and equally far-reaching implications. Under British control the Suez Canal is not only a maritime but an air route, both actually and potentially, between West and East. Whereas under normal conditions and under license commercial airlines, and ordinarily military planes as well, are permitted to operate on the most favorable intercontinental routes through the Middle East, the rise of political tensions could result in the canceling of such privileges at any time. While the physical inhibiting of air navigation is almost impossible to countries deficient in fast planes and anti-aircraft devices, effective barriers still can be erected in terms of unfriendly diplomatic relations. When instances of aerial trespass are likely to be reflected in attitudes throughout an area such as the Middle East, protests may be fully as effectual as military equipment.

For these reasons, the final ending of British sway in the Suez Canal zone will make possible a return, practically speaking, to the time when the Ottoman Empire interposed a barrier between the western world and the countries of the farther East. Aden, long a British key position on the Arabian coast commanding the mouth of the Red Sea, will have lost much of its meaning. The oil resources of the Persian Gulf will be less secure and potentially less accessible. The Sudan, whatever its political future, will find itself relatively remote from the western world. Members of the British Commonwealth in distant parts will be even more distant. Australia and New Zealand presumably will have no less interest in a Middle East Defense Organization, but will occupy a somewhat altered relationship to it. A strategic concept in which the Suez Canal is no longer under international control and no base available to western powers remains within the Canal zone would appear to be fraught with handicaps. For these, Cyprus offers no remedy, nor does the presence of Turkey in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

The reasons for such an unpromising situation undoubtedly have been many. Some derive from circumstances of an historical nature, others from events, policies and conditions recent or current. Many of the existing differences in outlook between western powers and the Arab-Iranian states stem in one way or another from the grafting of the spirit of modern nationalism upon the ancient trunk of Islam. The fruits of this union seem strange to western eyes and sour to western tastes. Among these fruits is lasting hostility toward the Jewish state of Israel and animosity toward the nations regarded as having collaborated in Israel's establishment. The reluctance of Great Britain, traditionally a great imperial power and even recently the ruler of a large part of the Arab world, to surrender its remaining footholds in Egypt and the Sudan contributes to Arab doubts as to British aims and purposes. The more recent activities of the United States as an ally of Great Britain and as a sponsor of Israel are suspect. There is considerable doubt as to the real motives behind the Point Four program—doubt augmented by the zeal with which economic and technical aid is proffered while the arms and armaments ardently desired are withheld. The fate of any national policy in the international field rests largely with its attractiveness to those toward whom it is directed. Unless policy is to be implemented by force, those who seek must be prepared to negotiate in terms intelligible to and esteemed by those from whom advantage is sought. Mutual security depends upon the mutuality of the ends sought and the means proposed.

At least until this precept is fully learned and acted upon by western nations, the Middle East will continue to be a problem area. Many of those long acquainted with the criteria and the institutional life of the peoples of the area hopefully express the opinion that their prejudices toward the nations of the West are not yet so deeply ingrained as not to be susceptible of neutralization and that there is still the possibility of enlisting them in the effort to gain free world security through cooperative endeavor. In the idiom of the East, inshallah that may come to pass. Those charged with the task of pursuing this objective, however, at best will find it a difficult assignment. The Middle East is so situated relative to the principal habitable areas of the world that at all times there is bound to be international competition for predominant influence in its constituent countries. In view of the fundamental needs and deficiencies of the area, such competition is very apt to cause confusion and disturbances among the indigenous peoples. Considering their long experience with the methods employed by great states bent on consolidating their positions and advancing their own interests in the Middle East corridor, there is little occasion for wonder that the peoples of the area, skeptical as to offers of friendship and uncertain as to where the greater danger lies, prefer for the time being to seek safety in neutralism.

THE JAPANESE GENERAL ELECTION OF 1952*

PAUL S. DULL

University of Oregon

Japan, on October 1, 1952, held the first general election for members of the House of Representatives since the end of the occupation. In that election, the conservative government party, the Jiyūtō (Liberal party), won a clear majority, the Communist party failed to elect a single candidate, and there was a marked advance by the two Socialist parties.¹

An analysis of the election, however, does not fall into easy classifications. Although Japan's relations with the United States, China, and the Soviet Union, the question of rearmament and revision of Article IX of the constitution to provide the legal base for rearmament, the San Francisco treaties, and internal financial policies furnished controversial issues for party stands, the Japanese voter was confused by both the complexities of intraparty quarrels and the ambiguities of many of the candidates' campaigns. Japanese party politics since the inauguration of the Meiji constitution has been characterized by groupings around personalities rather than platforms. That characteristic appears to be a continuing political phenomenon under the new constitution.

Prime Minister Yoshida dissolved the lower house of the Diet in August, although his Liberal party had the support of 285 of the 466 members of the House of Representatives.² It was generally agreed that an election at this time would afford him the best opportunity to extend his premiership and his party's superiority in the Diet. Postponement of a general election would have allowed the articulate opposition to his government to crystallize. It was a political gamble, but Yoshida was playing gambler's odds.

Since the last general election of January 23, 1949, there had been much shifting of personnel within and among parties. In the Liberal party, a struggle had developed between Yoshida and the former party president, Hatoyama Ichiro. Hatoyama had been purged in 1946, the party presidency passing to Yoshida. In 1952 Hatoyama was depurged and began a campaign to recapture his lost influence and position. Thus the Liberal party entered the election campaign with an internal battle. While most of the Liberal candidates avoided taking sides publicly, the internal quarrel made the choice of the new Prime Minister dependent upon intra-Liberal party conferences and inter-party deals prior to the reopening of the Diet around November 1. The split between the two factions became acute on September 29th, when the Yoshida-controlled executive committee expelled the pro-Hatoyama ex-Finance Minister, Ishibashi Tanzan, and the former Secretary-General of the party, Kono Ichiro.³

Shigemitsu Mamoru, released last year from Sugamo prison after having served the sentence imposed upon him as a war criminal by the International Military Tribunal for the Far East, entered politics and became the president of the Progressive party.⁴ The Progressive party has shown instability since its postwar inauguration. Drawing from prewar Minseitō personnel and policies, it first appeared as Shimpotō, then Minshutō, and, last year, it was again reorganized under Shigemitsu as Kaishintō. Its primary need has been a popular name to draw support, Ashida Hitoshi never having recovered from the bribery scandal which overthrew his premiership in 1948. With its reorganization, the Progressive party attracted some members from the Liberal party.

The Socialist party, too, has had difficulties since its postwar appearance. Disagreement over basic policies, as well as personal quarrels, finally led to a split into two parties: Right-wing Socialist and Left-wing Socialist.

The election campaign was vigorously but peacefully fought. On the related problems of rearmament and the maintenance of Japan's independence, the Liberal party, although implicitly in favor of eventual rearmament, advocated for the present a program of strengthening the national power, materially and spiritually, before rearming. It also advocated maintenance of internal order by a tough subversive activities prevention law and a strong National Police Reserve. It stood by its treaties and agreements with the Western bloc and its friendship with the United States. It also pressed for a strengthening of international collective security. On the issue of relations with China and Russia, the party platform said that such relations depended upon the sincerity of these two countries. Individual candidates, however, attacked both.⁵ On domestic problems, the Liberals stood for a reduction of taxes, and were opposed to taxes which prevented the accumulation of capital. They were accused by their opponents of proposing the lowering of the taxes of the wealthy without a proportionate reduction in taxes affecting the working class. The party also stood for government control of prices, crop requisitioning, and planned food production. It also advocated industrial rationalization and increased bond issues, which the opposition said would lead to another spiral of inflation. Liberals were for legal restrictions against general strikes.

The Progressive party did not differ materially from the Liberal party on the major issues. The Progressives did advocate rearmament without the Liberal time restriction. In essence, they were for the Liberal program but said they could carry it out better. The Right-wing Socialists placed their faith in the United Nations to protect Japan and were against rearmament. They were not anti-American. With regard to China and Russia, the platform requested these two countries to renounce recourse to armed revolution and to cooperate with international efforts for peace. It recommended that attempts be made to reopen trade relations with both countries. In domestic policy, the party wanted reduced taxation of those in the lower income bracket, including complete exemption from taxation of all incomes below ¥20,000 per month.^{*} It advocated government control and government planning but not government ownership of industry.

The real beginning of a division between left and right was marked by the Left-wing Socialist party. It opposed not only rearmament but also those parts of the Peace Treaty that provided for American garrisons in Japan. It opposed the Security Pact and the Administrative Agreement between the United States and Japan. Many of its candidates were openly hostile to the United States. On the other hand, the party advocated opening of trade relations with China and Russia and the negotiation of an overall peace treaty that would include these two countries. Domestically, while not going so far as to endorse all-out government ownership of property, Left-wing Socialists were in favor of a greater degree of government control of the nation's economy than were Right-wing Socialists.

The Labor-Farm party, in the anti-American camp, opposed the San Francisco agreements and rearmament. The Cooperative party placed its trust in maintaining Japan's independence in "new international socialism," but would rearm by autonomous defense units guarding against the resurgence of militarism. The Reconstruction League was openly chauvinistic.

The Communist party platform followed its usual line. The United States must be excluded from Japan, Japan's economy must be oriented toward China and Russia, the National Police Reserve, whose members were called mercenaries of the United States, must be liquidated and the defense of Japan entrusted to People's Armies. On the domestic side, the Communists advocated a program that would be a transitional stage from Japan's present position to socialism.

Despite predictions of possible disorder during the election—it was feared that the Communist party might adopt strong-arm tactics—the election was without major incident. There were more than 11,000 reported violations of Japan's rather stringent election laws which forbid, among other things, house-to-house solicitation of votes, general distribution of handbills or public posting of campaign signs, and unauthorized public rallies.⁷ On election day the Communist party covered the cities with illegal handbills, but beyond that the anticipated trouble did not develop.

The Liberal party, with 240 candidates elected, captured a majority in the House of Representatives. However, this number was a reduction of 45 seats from the 285 held at the time of the dissolution of the Diet. The Progressive party captured 85 seats, a gain of 18, but far below its pre-election expectations. The Right-wing Socialist party gained 57 seats, an increase of 27; the Left-wing Socialist party won 54 seats, a gain of 38. The Communist party failed to seat a single candidate, although it had captured 35 seats in the 1949 election and held 22 at the time of the dissolution of the Diet. Its total vote of 894,823 comprised 2.6% of the ballots cast, compared with its 1949 total of 2,984,771, which was 9.8% of the votes cast. The Cooperative party with 2 seats compared with the 5 it held in August, and the Labor-Farm party with 4 seats, the same as in August, remained unimportant. The Reconstruction League, the new nationalist party, gained but a single seat. The various other small parties had 4 seats as against 6 in August. The unaffiliated successful candidates numbered 19 as against 2 in August.

The election results, although establishing a majority party, did not give it any positive mandate regarding the major issues of the campaign. Any interpretation that the loss of seats by the Liberals and the sizeable gain by the two Socialist parties mean a partial repudiation of American policy in Japan and a stand against rearmament must be tempered by several other considerations. Dissatisfaction with a government faced with disagreeable problems that have no popular solution, the lack of a definite stand by many Liberal candidates on these issues, and voting for persons rather than for policies enter the political equation. The complete ousting of Communists from the House of Representatives was a major political change. It did not come about because of the Communist party's shifting its support to Socialist candidates. The Communist offer of a united front with the Socialists was rejected, and Communist attacks on both wings were as bitter as those made against the Yoshida government. The shift from the Communist to the Socialist parties can be better interpreted as a shift of non-Communist party member leftists from support of the Communist line to support of the Socialist program. Even though many Japanese dislike Yoshida's arrangements with the United States, they are not beguiled at this time by the Communist story of Russia's benign policy toward the Far East and Japan. Furthermore, the election stands as a repudiation of the Communist party's recent Bolshevik tactics. If this election indicates a trend toward the left, it is toward an indigenous left. The desire for real independence, it is suggested, transcends other political ideologies.

At the same time, evidence of resurgent nationalism is to be found in the election of 140 candidates who have been depurged. Yet it is doubtful that this means a rising Fascism, as some political observers fear. In general the depurged were distributed among all parties and were not ultra-nationalists as a group. While a few ultra-nationalists, such as Tsuji Masanobu, Kuhara Fusanosuke, and Kita Reikichi, were elected, the Reconstruction League succeeded in electing only one representative, and other ultra-nationalists such as Muto Santoku of Okayama-ken were defeated.

It would appear, then, that the Japanese voter has rejected both right and left extremism and has continued to support a conservative government. The loss of conservative support as compared with the 1949 election has been to the advantage of the more moderate and independent leftist politicians.

Japan's policies during the life of the new government are rather clearly defined by the results of the election. Japan has, for the moment, cast her lot with the West, particularly the United States. The San Francisco patterns, therefore, will be continued. The government will try to stabilize Japan's economy through positive cooperation with the United States, with defense industries as the heart of Japan's economy. Japan will assume the character of a sub-contractor of the United States, particularly in American procurements for Korea and development projects in Southeast Asia. With regard to rearmament, the new government will have the strength to present, if it so decides, an amendment to Article IX of the constitution, looking forward to an ultimate conscription system. The opposition (Left-wing Socialist party and Labor-Farm party) does not have the parliamentary strength to stop this program. Thus, even though the conservative politicians have lost ground in the election, they maintain enough strength to continue their right-of-center program.

If the Liberal party cabinet fails to have a long life, its fall will be due more to a resumption of intra-party quarreling together with political opportunism by the Progressive party and the Right-wing Socialist party than to inherent opposition to the government's program.

The Paley Commission has injected a stream of fresh air into a public policy atmosphere that had become stuffy from the constant recycling of the ideas of the early New Deal and those usually associated with the names of Theodore Roosevelt, Gifford Pinchot, and Robert Malthus (the latter ideas known today as "Neo-Malthusian"). Its approach to the free world's resources problem emphasizes the requirements or end use side of resources: "The growth of demand is at the core of the materials problem we face." Very broadly, this approach, first, foresees for a considerable number of years the basic economic characteristics of the society with which it is concerned—by projection of such factors as population, working force, and gross national product. Second, it estimates the resources requirements of such a society. How much copper, for example, would be demanded in the year 1975, if the price of copper, relative to the general level of prices, were to remain constant? This estimate is derived, in turn, from estimates of the demand for those end products, such as telephones, which use copper. Third, this approach estimates the supplies of resources that are likely to be forthcoming at the assumed prices. These projections depend, among other factors, on careful estimates of reserves, in terms of their economic as well as physical availability. And finally, by indicating the probable extent of demand and supply at constant relative prices, this approach enables one to foresee potential price rises and to plan in advance to forestall them or adjust to them by measures designed to expand production, where this can be done without much increase in cost, or by measures designed to develop substitutes, reduce physical waste, and the like, where increased supply cannot be induced.

It will be objected by some that the Paley approach places too great emphasis on economics and especially on costs and prices. This need not and should not be the case. To the contrary, the Paley approach can be used to introduce a degree of flexibility into analyses of conservation which, too often in the past, have become stuck on inflexible concepts of physical stocks of resources. Thus, the use of projections and of price factors in these projections can provide a sensible framework for balanced judgment between policies for increasing domestic production of any resource (by pushing back the technological, physical, and economic boundaries that limit supply); policies for increasing procurement from foreign sources; and policies for reducing demand for the resource (by more efficient designs and processes and the use of substitute materials). No other approach to conservation and resources problems offers a framework of analysis so broad and yet so useful and meaningful.

By its very nature, the Paley approach requires the combined consideration of resources related in use. Thus, for example, it becomes well-nigh impossible to consider petroleum policy without giving full attention to competing sources of energy—coal, natural gas, and hydroelectric power. This has not been the case in the past where, under other frameworks of analysis, petroleum policy has been considered independently of policies for the other energy fuels.

It will be argued that the grouping of resources in terms of end uses, as required by the Paley approach, is deficient because it deflects emphasis from the overriding importance of the unity of resources in nature. Thus, relating hydroelectric power to coal and oil overlooks the relation of hydroelectric power to irrigation, navigation, and the general multiple purpose development of the river and its watershed—a concept which has at long last asserted itself with great insistency. Certainly the natural unity of resources cannot be disregarded, and the concept of multiple purpose river development must be applied. But this does not mean that the most fruitful framework for resources analysis is one which uses for major classifications water, land, and minerals. The need is rather for an analysis of hydroelectric power in relation to other energy sources, of irrigation in relation to other sources for increasing agricultural production, of navigation in relation to other means of transportation; and then for an adjustment and modification of the results obtained in the light of the optimum multiple purpose development of the river basin.

It is true, of course, that the Paley approach, like any other, can be applied too narrowly; and this must be guarded against if it is to serve as a framework for public policy. The approach might be applied so as to emphasize only national and overlook regional factors in resources development; and to a certain degree the Paley report does slight regional factors. On the other hand, the Paley approach will minimize the danger of equating resources development with regionalism, an error committed too often under other frameworks of analysis. Similarly, the Paley approach might be applied so as to emphasize economic policy issues and overlook those related to social objectives and organization. But the Report gives adequate attention to problems of organization and states explicitly certain social objectives, about which more will be said below.

In its 25-year projections of the basic economic characteristics of our society, the Commission has made two assumptions which are of considerable interest to the student of political economy. First is the emphasis on growth. Our gross national product, says the Commission, will be double in 1975 what it was in 1950—almost 550 as against 273 billion dollars. Why this belief in growth? At one point, the Commission says its belief is irrational: "... we share the belief of the American people in the principle of Growth. Granting that we cannot find any absolute reason for this belief we admit that to our Western minds it seems preferable to any opposite, which to us implies stagnation and decay." At another point the Commission presents a very definite rationale for the growth rate selected, and impliedly for the belief in growth itself, when it states that the rate of growth assumed is merely the past or historical rate of 3 per cent a year.

These statements taken together are a reflection, it is believed, of a somewhat awkward or self-conscious attitude of economists in adjusting to a new emphasis for public policy. Only since the postwar depression, for which they planned so carefully, failed to develop, have economists as a group turned their backs on depression psychology with its stress on fiscal policy, compensatory spending, and the like, and turned instead to an emphasis on steady and continuing growth and on projections of this growth. Yet, in doing this and in seeking the "scientific" data to support it, they find that, through it all, there has been a long range rate of growth of roughly 3 per cent a year, and it is only this rate which they now predict for the future.

In a real sense it is this emphasis on growth which distinguishes the Paley approach to resources development and conservation from that of the early New Deal. Then, conservation was associated with depression public works (PWA) and the social need to get unemployed boys out of the sweaty city and into the open (CCC). Roosevelt himself, and men like Harold Ickes, had a more genuine belief in sustained resources development for use. They had the faith and vision to realize that works such as Bonneville and Grand Coulee would be vitally needed in the future and would help to build an industrial empire in the Pacific Northwest. But many opposed these dams; they called them "white elephants." And a good number of those who supported them did so primarily because they were employment-creating, economy-stimulating public works.

A second basic assumption of the Paley Commission which deserves discussion is that the combined materials requirements and supplies of the entire "free non-Communist world" should be considered at the same time. Thus, projections are made of gross national product and of material requirements for Free Europe, the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia and New Zealand, and Japan; and of material requirements alone for the rest of the free world—the less developed, raw material producing areas, for which gross national product would have no special significance. There is a chapter in Volume I entitled "Promoting Free World Expansion"; and the commissioners "believe that the destinies of the United States and the rest of the free non-Communist world are inextricably bound together. This belief we hope will color everything we have to say about the Materials Problem." These projections and statements might lead one, especially a fellow free world citizen, to expect that the resources demands of West Germany, Italy, Japan, and Indonesia, will be given equal consideration in the Report with those of the United States. But they are not. The major emphasis throughout is on the needs of the United States and on public policies to meet them—so much so, in fact, that the Commission has been charged by some with bowing towards the free world and speaking a prologue in its behalf, and then proceeding to act out a highly nationalistic drama.

I do not concur in this charge, though I recognize that the Report is somewhat schizophrenic in this regard. This can be attributed to a number of factors: First, considerably less information is available on the requirements and resources of the free world than on those of the United States alone; second, the Commission feared, no doubt, that it would be charged with meddling in the affairs of other nations if it ventured beyond the foreign resources functions and responsibilities of the United States Government, United States investors, and possibly international agencies of which the United States is a member; finally, with respect to the underdeveloped areas, to which the Report devotes considerable attention, the Commission has proceeded on an assumption which it does not, and in the light of available data probably cannot, prove. Thus, the Commission assumes that the development of mineral resources in an underdeveloped country, both for export and for domestic use, will lay the basis for a general and diversified economic development in that country, thereby improving its living standards. On the basis of this assumption the Commission proposes increased foreign investment in the mineral industries of the underdeveloped countries, estimating the costs of the desired development in the terms of the mining engineer, with some allowances for port and other direct development costs.

Critics of the Report look at these cost estimates, complain that they do not include the total costs of minerals and concomitant general economic development, and conclude that the Commission has viewed the problems of the underdeveloped area from inside the United States rather than from inside the underdeveloped country itself. The critics are wrong if the Commission's assumed relationship between minerals and general economic development is right. But who knows? The few considerations which the Commission presents to support its view are not conclusive.

The Commission's policy proposals, designed to enable society to forestall or adjust to potential price rises indicated by the projections, are too numerous to mention, let alone evaluate, in a review. The philosophy underlying these proposals, however, can be discussed with profit. This philosophy is that unfettered private enterprise, free from government controls and regulated to the greatest extent by "the spur of the profit motive," "the competitive market structure," and "the price system," will bring about the desired adjustments. "We believe in a minimum of interference with these patterns of private enterprise."

"But," the Commissioners go on to assert, "to believe in a minimum of interference is not to believe that this minimum must be set at zero. Private enterprise has itself from time to time asked for helps, or restraints, or counterpoises from Government. . . . for this reason, among others, we have experienced for a long time a mixture of private and public influences on the functioning of our economy." In reviewing the proposals for "public influences" on "the competitive structures" of the mineral resource industries, one might conclude that it is the "helps"—in the form of free government services and subsidies, largely as tax relief—with which the Commissioners are most concerned. Their proposal that the present liberal provisions for expensing of exploration costs for oil and gas be retained and, at the same time, that the rates of percentage depletion for these fuels be kept at their present high levels—27½ per cent per annum—provides a dramatic illustration.

The strong bias for unfettered, but aided, private enterprise in its proposals for the mineral industries stands in sharp contrast, however, to the Commission's proposals for the renewable resources. For forestry, the Commission supports the ultimate in control—compulsory regulation of cutting on private forest lands. States are to be encouraged to enact such legislation, but "if after five years there still remain important gaps in the State system of compulsory regulation, Federal legislation should be enacted authorizing the Federal Government to establish minimum cutting practice regulations." For industrial water supplies, the Commission suggests the possibility of a federal punitive tax against industrial polluters. The application of such a tax would have effects similar to that of close federal regulation. And for agriculture, the Commission accepts pretty much the present system of supports and controls, though it hopes that a greater emphasis on farm management planning will reduce the necessity for relying on them.

How, then, can these proposals for vastly increased regulation for forestry and for consideration of further federal controls over industrial water users be explained? One can always say that the problems are vastly different from those in the mineral industries. And this is right; but so are the problems in the oil industry quite different from those of copper. Furthermore, the whole flavor of the chapters and monographs on the renewable resources can be distinguished from that of the chapters on the mineral resources; they are not nearly so aggressively free-market oriented. Again, why? I do not know; but I should like to suggest two possible reasons: First, most of the mineral resources (except, to a limited extent, the energy fuels and those minerals located on the public domain) have not been the object of broad and comprehensive public policy treatment in the last thirty years as have forestry, water, and agricultural resources; and the leaders of the mineral industries, as well as the government's mineral experts in the Geological Survey and the Bureau of Mines, continue to resist such treatment. Second, and not unrelated, the Paley Commission included more mineral industry executives than any other group. George R. Brown is a big Texas oil man, and Arthur Bunker is president of Climax Molybdenum Company; and their points of view in many of the Commission's deliberations were, as should be expected, those of the mineral industries. The other Commissioners were William Paley, Chairman of the Board of Columbia Broadcasting Company; Eric Hodgins, a senior editor of Fortune; and Edward Mason, Dean of the Graduate School of Public Administration, Harvard.

Though there may be many valid criticisms of the Commission's proposals and even of the insistency and consistency with which the Commission has pursued its basic philosophy in regard to the non-renewable resources, the Paley report is the most original and significant contribution to the study of resources and public policy since the 1933 report of the Mississippi Valley Committee and the early reports of the National Resources Committee. Already, most government agencies are reexamining and reevaluating their resources programs in the new light of the "Paley approach."

The States and Subversion. EDITED BY WALTER GELLHORN. (Ithaca: Cornell University Press. 1952. Pp. vii, 454. $5.00.)

These are four volumes in the series of Cornell Studies in Civil Liberties sponsored by the Rockefeller Foundation and conducted under the direction of Professor Robert E. Cushman. It is a distinguished series, dealing with one of the most perplexing problems of our times and written by exceptionally qualified, temperate, and responsible scholars. It constitutes the most meticulous description and penetrating analysis ever undertaken of the many-faceted governmental programs purporting to promote internal security through exposing and controlling disloyalty and subversion. Thoughtful citizens, whether professional scholars or not, should be beholden to the Rockefeller Foundation for making these studies possible and to Professor Cushman for his initiative in this notable enterprise.

The Tenney Committee is a tight, carefully documented account of the major activities of California's Fact-Finding Committee on Un-American Activities. Authorized to investigate "subversive" activities generally, the committee interpreted its mandate broadly, exercising unfettered discretion substantively and procedurally. Operating mainly through the technique of generously publicized public hearings, the committee spent $146,000, produced over fifty volumes of typewritten transcripts of hearings and five formal reports totaling 2,241 pages, and recommended a legislative program of more than twenty bills, of which five were ultimately enacted. One was subsequently declared unconstitutional by the California Supreme Court. The flavor of these bills is suggested by one providing that courses in the Constitution of the United States and American History should not be combined with social science or social studies, and by another forbidding the teaching of politically controversial subjects in the elementary grades. Neither was enacted. The redoubtable Tenney emerges as a legislative St. George dedicated to destroying dragons of ideological impurity in California.

The author attributes the public opposition which the committee ultimately engendered to its dogmatic assumptions concerning the nature and extent of the communist movement, which led it to identify opposition to its methods with sympathy with communism. As the San Francisco Chronicle quipped:

A Communist is any Who disagrees with Tenney.

Tenney's withdrawal from the committee in 1949 probably ranks among the more fortuitous events in California since the gold rush. Vigorous critics of the committee have asserted that it was an instrumentality of reactionary business interests to break crusading labor unions and discredit liberal movements. The author states that he saw no evidence to support the charge of such a deliberate conspiracy. On the contrary he is convinced that Tenney and other members of the committee were honestly convinced of the justice and necessity of their endeavor.

The author includes generous quotations from the transcripts of committee hearings and reports, and from press accounts of its activity. He writes with a disciplined objectivity which one might argue is too detached in the light of the record he presents. His technique, however, is to project the documentary evidence, which speaks for itself. This is vivid and effective. "There are no scales," he writes, "that can tell us accurately whether in the balance the activities of the Tenney Committee were of service or disservice to the state." Barrett's sharpest criticism is directed toward the conduct of the hearings. The evidence convinces him that they "were not conducted in a manner calculated to permit rational finding of fact. A general view suggests that prosecution rather than investigation was the theme." Senator Tenney's personality, he says, "added much that was irrational to the hearings"; the obvious purpose of the hearings was to publicize conclusions rather than find facts; and much of the testimony presented was not tested for reliability. The pattern has become a familiar one, but nowhere does it emerge more bluntly than in this most melodramatic of all un-American activities committees.

Un-American Activities in the State of Washington is a report of the brief, episodic life of the Canwell Committee (Joint Legislative Committee on Un-American Activities) and the investigation conducted by the University of Washington. Compared to the Tenney Committee the Canwell Committee was a model of restraint. It held two extensive hearings, the second of which resulted in a successful contempt action against five witnesses for refusing to answer questions concerning their political affiliation. Two volumes of testimony were published, naming a vast number of people afflicted with a vague species of ideological sin. Unlike some of its counterparts in other states, membership in the Canwell Committee produced no great political pay-off. Of four members of the committee whose legislative terms expired in 1948, only one was re-elected. Canwell himself was defeated after campaigning on his committee record, declaring that "those who attack the committee are either ignorant or subversive." The lone successful candidate made no issue of his work on the committee.

The author presents a meticulous job of factual reporting, eschewing all value judgments until his final chapter of general appraisal. This reviewer had the feeling that, given the mass of detailed material presented, some advantage would have accrued from drawing conclusions and presenting short summaries at the end of several of the chapters. In his appraisal the author seriously questions the legitimacy of the committee's work, which focused almost exclusively on the political beliefs and associations of the people it investigated. He is convinced that much of the vast bulk of evidence published by the committee is questionable on its face. Much is hearsay, personal opinion, impossible to evaluate. Some is patently capricious, as when one J. B. Matthews, a professional "friendly" witness among committees of this sort, devised a formula for identifying "fellow travelers" which scooped in the names of Albert Einstein and Senator Charles Tobey. Countryman concludes that the general flavor of the interrogation at committee hearings was "well designed to produce a collection of rumors, opinions, suspicions, and perhaps hallucinations which will furnish content for newspaper headlines, but is not likely to get information of much reliability. . . ." Hence the "committee was not after facts . . . it was after charges." A careful analysis of the tenure proceedings of the University of Washington convinces the author that ". . . it is impossible to conclude the University of Washington is better equipped today for its 'quest for truth' than it was before the Canwell committee began its investigation."

Loyalty and Legislative Action surveys New York's activity from 1919 to 1949: the Lusk Committee investigations of 1919-20; the Ives Loyalty Oath Law; the McNaboe investigations; the Devany Law; the Rapp-Coudert Committee investigations of the New York City schools; investigations of the Board of Higher Education; and the Feinberg Law. The author handles his subject on a high level of reporting and critical evaluation throughout. His judgments are discriminating and precise. While deploring the substance of the Devany Law, he emphasizes its detailed procedural safeguards. Criticizing the procedural defects of the Coudert Committee, he emphasizes its honest desire to protect the innocent and avoid sensational publicity. His conclusions are comprehensive and direct. The Lusk Committee and the McNaboe Committee engaged in "egregious nonsense." The Lusk Committee, in particular, "violated almost every canon of responsible conduct," employed "the tactics of the side show barker and the old-time patent medicine hawker," and "ranged recklessly over the entire area of individual rights with wanton disregard for such fundamentals as separation of powers or due process of law." The New York experience convinces the author that politically constituted committees are inherently incapable of dealing satisfactorily with subversive activity. He warns of the semantic fog which blankets the word "subversive," of the problems of identifying communists, that the price of communist purges is a closed society, that loyalty probes focus on the transgressor rather than on the conditions which have produced unrest, and that judgment in these matters is guided by formula rather than evidence. He recommends certain procedural reforms in the conduct of investigations, and finally expresses more concern over the possibility of intellectual conformity in schools than over the possibility of a few instances of taint.

The States and Subversion is a symposium dealing with California, Illinois, Maryland, Michigan, New York, and Washington. Chapters on California, New York, and Washington are capsule presentations of the foregoing books by their respective authors. E. Houston Harsha writes on the Broyles Commission of Illinois which, on the record he presents, accomplished little other than the stimulation of the adrenal glands of its own members. Possibly the most fruitful result of the hearings, which focused largely on alleged subversion in education, was Robert Hutchins' statement that "The question is not what our professors belong to but what they are doing." William B. Prendergast analyzes Maryland's anti-communist Ober Law. His estimate is judicious. Believing that the need for the law was never satisfactorily demonstrated, he nevertheless concludes that it avoids many defects which frequently debase this kind of statute. Robert J. Mowitz examines Michigan's bout with subversion. Michigan has augmented the usual safeguards against subversion by forbidding the display of Red flags and establishing a special Subversive Activities Division in the state police department. Detroit initiated the first full-scale municipal loyalty program, and to this the author devotes considerable attention.

The concluding chapter, written by Gellhorn, is pithy and forthright. He believes the record shows that freedom has sometimes been threatened and impaired by the attempts to preserve it. "Prudence can be overborne by hate and fear as well as by carelessness." He is worried about the enlarged concern over groups as distinct from individuals; he wonders whether "anticipatory criminality" ought to gain recognition in American law; he thinks legislation is an inappropriate medium for expressing loathing; and that democracy is not likely to be preserved by closing the ballot box to those who may not cherish democracy, or by eliciting orthodoxy from teachers by stratagems of creeping pressures. He warns that American principles of fairness, wisdom, and freedom were not wrought for periods of calm and comfort.

In all of the books except Un-American Activities in the State of Washington the authors include selected documentary materials in appendices.

Few communists have been caught by the vast apparatus of investigation and legislation ostensibly devised to entrap them. By 1950 over 300 state statutes were directed at subversion. This is defense in depth with a vengeance. One may well think of this what Holmes thought of three generations of imbeciles: it's enough.

The wages of orthodoxy are stagnation and death for the democratic community. These volumes offer variations on the same theme: professional patriots engaged in competitive orthodoxy. On the evidence presented, moderation and a rational relation of means to ends are the exception in the search for subversion. Sincerity may motivate the search, but sincerity without temperance imperils. Inquisition is usually clothed with sincerity. What emerges from these studies is the fact that America is ideologically unprepared for the exigencies of cold war. Why? Part of the answer lies in the nature of American culture and the psychological responses of Americans to their present travail. We are a people of action, unusually ethnocentric, accustomed to achieving results on a grand scale. Confronted with an invidious and protean form of imperialism, we are frustrated. Unable to cope effectively with the source of the danger in Moscow, we have become victims of a pervasive anxiety neurosis. Fearing that which we cannot reach, we transfer our hostility to that which we can reach.

We are burdened with the irrationality of fear. The legislative activity related in these studies reflects attempts to assuage varieties of conscious and subconscious anxiety. Unmistakable overtones of sadism are revealed by the record. Psychologists inform us that sadistic strivings help the individual to escape his unbearable feelings of powerlessness. Research in the authoritarian personality or the ethnocentric personality reveals tendencies of stereotypy, intolerance, self-glorification, lack of individuality, condemnation of complex political behavior. Contributions of analysts such as Fromm, Frenkel-Brunswick, and Adorno offer much to clarify understanding of the psychological and sociopolitical facets of the phenomena with which these volumes deal. Research in political behavior can further enlighten understanding in these matters. Perhaps causes of this particular trauma in the body politic are also to be found in structural aspects of American society, as C. Wright Mills and Sebastian de Grazia have suggested in their respective analyses of social morality and the disintegration of belief systems in the political community.

These studies in the Cornell series admirably fulfill the purpose for which they were written: to describe and analyze their subject largely within a legal frame of reference. Beyond this frame of reference, however, lie broad and significant factors suggested above. Further exploration along these paths would provide a valuable supplement to the excellent work already accomplished by the authors of these books.

Marsilius of Padua, the Defender of Peace: Volume I, Marsilius of Padua and Medieval Political Philosophy. BY ALAN GEWIRTH. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1951. Pp. 342. $4.75)

Perhaps the most difficult task confronting the historian of political thought is to steer a clear course between that historicism which reads the past as though it were concerned with contemporary issues and that historical relativism which renders that past an absolute elsewhere, relevant to itself alone. Positively, it is his job to understand past thinkers and movements by a clear grasp of their problems, their frame of reference, and their intellectual and cultural heritage in such a way as to discover their genuinely relevant insights and the proper applicability and limitations of their fundamental viewpoint, and to avoid their facile use as supports or as whipping-boys in current controversies, in an age which professes reliance on scientific reason but too often searches for the support of authorities who lend, or can be made to lend, prestige to positions presently taken.

Marsilius of Padua's Defensor Pacis (1324) has in recent times been construed as an anticipation of most subsequent political thinkers and doctrines, and has been read successively in our own day as an ardent defense of democracy and as a support of totalitarianism. Patient and careful examination by a thorough scholar possessed at once of the submissive humility to give his author careful and respectful attention, of that degree of equality basic to effective appreciation and critical judgment, of that range of knowledge both of previous and of later thought necessary to sound construction and correct inference, and of that disinterested concern for truth which eschews superficial similarities and ready lessons, has for some time been wanting and wanted, especially for the service of the non-specialist confused by claims and counter-claims, and lacking in the expertise required for their judicious assessment.

Professor Alan Gewirth meets the criteria, and discharges the obligation in the volume here reviewed; and one may anticipate with reasonable confidence that the second volume, a critical edition and translation, will effectively complete the task of providing a definitive treatment for our time of a thinker who by sustained and consistent system radically challenged and changed for his time and place the terms and presuppositions of discourse concerning man and God, church and state, the individual and the social order. It is Professor Gewirth's great accomplishment to clarify the key concepts which are at the root of that change, to show its true nature, to make clear its ideological provenance and its institutional matrix, and so to reveal its fundamental force, which is something more and other than a plea for different governors and government: it is an insistence on different criteria of good, and on different measures and methods of analysis and assessment, for the political-social order and for the realm of religion, than those prevalent in the dominant thought of the Middle Ages, which, whatever the attitudes to papal claims, generally accepted the doctrines of the Two Powers and an absolutistic and transcendent ethic as criterion by which to measure and judge all earthly performance.

At the root of Marsilius' teaching, Professor Gewirth shows, is biological nature, human will, a search for earthly satisfactions, and consequent conflicts to be resolved. The political order is necessary to such resolution, and to the provision of satisfactions: the criterion of its success and adequacy is earthly peace, and the value of any regime depends on the relation of its ends, as effective purposes, to the attainment of common weal, the effective welfare of its people. Marsilius' viewpoint is, then, secular and naturalistic; and he reconstructs authorities and reshapes traditional issues in that light. In particular, he relies on Aristotle, but follows Averroes, not Aquinas, in discovering his meaning and significance; as he uses the realistic and positivistic insights of St. Augustine's analysis of the city of earth, while abandoning his concern with the ultimate City of God.

From these general attitudes, Professor Gewirth brilliantly demonstrates, follow all of Marsilius' specific political teachings, including the very real difficulties he confronts and the imperfect reconciliations he achieves where the logic of his assumptions makes for imperfect consistency. Moreover, once granted the assumptions, the Discourses into which The Defender of the Peace is divided become coherent units in one whole, though the first, being a positive construction of his viewpoint rather than pure polemics in others' terms, remains the vital core of the treatise.

Professor Gewirth proceeds to show that Marsilius' state is begotten of men's material needs; that it is concerned with their overt behavior, not their inner grace; that it aims at stability, at order, at civil peace; and that the functions appropriate to government at any time depend on what is requisite to that end. What is vital is unity, in government and in law: the state, begotten of men's individual needs, becomes overriding authority over them as a very condition of peace. Yet, in the context of the time, such a doctrine was liberating: men were delivered from many jurisdictions, while the state itself was not concerned to make them good by law, but only to render them civil. Moreover, in the last analysis the will of the people, in whose interest the state exists, is supreme, and itself defines the conditions of public safety to which the preservation of the state itself is basic.

The succeeding chapters examine in detail Marsilius' consequent arguments as to the nature and function of law; the meaning of his doctrine that the people is the legislator, and the issue as to whether his concept of the "valentior pars" refers to quantity or quality, to majority rule or to elite; the issue of the relation of government as effectuation of law's commands and the source and authority of the law itself; and the implications for the church and church organization of a secular view of the overriding and final character of the people's authority. The work then ends with a brief but forceful chapter on "The Significance of Marsilius," historical and theoretical.

The whole work is marked by carefully intricate, yet clear, analysis. It is fair to its subject, yet critical. Its great learning is consistently used to prevent false inferences from Marsilius' arguments based on current frames of thought, and to emphasize warranted ones. While Professor Gewirth's structure is of course peculiar to his subject, the principles underlying his analysis and his effective following of them make this work a model of its kind, worthy of a place among the great analyses of individual political thinkers. For by careful steering through a mass of argument where erroneous inference is a constant temptation, Professor Gewirth achieves a clear and forceful interpretation which produces an irresistible conviction of correctness, and shows unanswerably the errors in previous, and conflicting, interpretations. Above all (though Professor Gewirth makes no such claim, save by implication) it becomes clear that, for all his immersion in his own time, place, and issues, Marsilius is worthy of a place among the fundamentally great political philosophers, as he is the basic fount and founder of the modern secular, pragmatically oriented, and democratically directed, approach to politics, and to life in society as a search for the earthly welfare of persons, as they seek and sense it.

New Fabian Essays. EDITED BY R. H. S. CROSSMAN. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, Inc. 1952. Pp. xv, 215. $4.00.)

This volume comprises eight essays, in six cases written by members of the executive committee of the Fabian Society. As Mr. Attlee points out in his introduction, only one, John Strachey, has had ministerial experience. Such names as Gaitskill and Jay are absent. The book is a conscious attempt to restate at the present time the position of the Fabian Society indicated in 1889 in the original Fabian Essays. The editor states his position to be, not that of "labourism," but of socialism, defined in terms of human equality and of respect for individual personality. This is sharply distinguished from the practice of the Soviet State which, Mr. Crossman urges, is government by an elite, wrongly believed to be that of "a workers' state." Whether, indeed, Marxists will be prepared to agree that this socialist respect for individual personality is incompatible with economic determinism and that, if so, Marxists are not true socialists is an interesting matter for speculation, in which my sympathies are with Mr. Crossman. With his analysis of Asian communism, as in leadership a movement of the intelligentsia, I cannot agree too heartily.

That Mr. Crossman's socialism, unlike Mr. Jenkins', is colored by a romantic secularism of the Bertrand Russell variety, is probably merely due to an error of semantics, due to confusion of religion with the mores of brewers and stockbrokers—or else with the escapism of occupants of ivory towers. The sooner British Socialism gets out and keeps out of this Bradlaughian error, which presents socialism as not only the practical fruit of religion in social equity and safeguard for the individual worker's liberty, but as the whole of true religion and undefiled, the better for its stamina and vitality. The alternative, if the lesson is not learned, will be the development of a Christian Social party as inevitably in Britain as in every other country of Western Europe, since a stable majority workers' vote for Toryism is highly improbable. The distributivist tendencies of Mr. Crossman, against bureaucratic and managerial monopoly, are novel, noteworthy and welcome.

Mr. Crossman is not alone in the peculiar kind of chauvinistic piety which holds that Britain is especially elected by destiny, as a non-imperialist country, to hold up the lamp of reason amid the brute contests of battling ideologies. He rightly points out that communism is often regarded by colonial peoples as emancipating and damns Britain's deplorable Iranian policy, not (alas!) unsupported by British Labour. He somersaults to the conclusion that Kremlinism in Asia often is emancipating. Let him tell this to Mr. Nehru. Sometimes Mr. Crossman and Mr. Bevan come near to a preposterous and almost Mosleyan attitude of "minding Britain's business" and endeavor to hoist up again the happily upset balance of power, with Britain astride the barrel. On the contrary what is needed is not ideological "detachment" but, as even Mr. E. H. Carr indicates ("Propaganda and Power," Yale Review, Vol. 42, pp. 1-9 [September, 1952]), ideological re-education. Whereas Mr. Crossman endeavors to square his conscience with the deliberately contrived destruction, inside the Iron Curtain, of millions of human beings in order to achieve the best of possible worlds, seeking (as was said of the Swiss in the 40's) to be "neutral between good and evil," Mr. Denys Healey, in his excellent and mature essay on foreign affairs, has no illusions that the Soviet Union will not be guilty of barbarity and aggression just because it has "a socialist economy." Mr. Healey is not, however, guiltless of the oddly parochial illusion that "Britain is now the one true country with genuine friends in Asia" (Iran?). Perhaps he underestimates the fight still to be waged against imperialist exploitation, for example by rubber lobbyists, or even by the metropolitan workers' own demands on colonial Africa, and shares with Mr. Crossman an uncritical belief in the virtues of General Mao's bloody revolution which, achieving power by promising peace to distressed China, gave war. What Mr. Healey does do is to provide a proper appraisal of the immense importance internationally of Ernest Bevan, while rightly warning against the right-wing materialism which thinks that all will be happy if enough money, unbacked by ideas, is put into buying friendship abroad.

Mr. John Strachey, convert from Mosleyism and convert from communism, in his essay confesses that, in his latest incarnation, he has been brought to accept that piecemeal economic hypothesis which is equally anathema to both systems. From this vantage he informs us that the experience of the Labour government of 1945-50 shows capitalism to be more malleable than the ideologists, doctrinaires and orthodox conventicle-ists had supposed. The peculiar curse of the "intellectuals" of the Labour party, as distinct from the Trade Union Movement, has been their lack of articulate alternatives to this jealous conventicle spirit of "the bitter men," who suffer from dyspepsia and Bloomsbury, of which the New Statesmen has often been the especial exponent. Except maybe for Mr. Crossman himself, there are no adequate successors, as social theorists, to Tawney, the younger Laski and perhaps Evan Durbin. It is fascinating for anyone with a long memory to discover Mr. Strachey finding in America an outstanding instance of the shift of social power. He still has indeed doubts, but exhorts "the social and political heart of the West" to be proved "sound and viable" (sic). Mr. Crossman, in his article, interestingly comments that much of the trouble in Britain is traditional and psychological, and that America and Sweden both offer the worker still a more "equal chance."

Others of the essays are of a more limited character. Bevanite Mr. Mikardo recommends that the Trade Unions employ more highly paid industrial consultants, a matter on which Mr. Mikardo can speak with authority. Mrs. Cole opines that enough concessions in education have been made to religious minorities, although of course they have some rights; but omits to discuss a major source of British national weakness, the jealous distrust between the leaders of Britain's economy and the still ivory-sheltered leaders of the academic world. Although the book centers on the thesis that equality, and not just "equality of opportunity," is the goal, there is no satisfactory investigation of what is meant by equality, elsewhere discussed by Tawney; or whether men reach worthwhile personality by struggle, as an achievement, or are just born with two legs and equal. The valuable but incomplete phrase as indicating what is "viable," "equality of respect," is not developed to indicate what values are to be respected; and until this is done there remains slackness of thinking. Equality of opportunity, not least for colored folk, has still much good to confer on the world in creating what seems to me to matter more—fraternity. As a beacon of faith amid the darkness of Britain's fate, whether as Great Power or as verging on a Swedish future, this book offers no great light. As a set of useful traffic lights in the fog, it will be useful to every student. But the search for the compelling social faith, equal to the challenge of the times, it is to be hoped will not be discontinued by traffic regulations.

Law; The Science of Inefficiency. BY WILLIAM SEAGLE. (New York: Macmillan Company. 1952. Pp. vii, 177. $3.50.)

This is a short, staccato recital of failures of the law to achieve some of its declared ends. Criminals escape punishment. Men whose carelessness has damaged others escape civil liability. Both public and individual litigants suffer the law's delays and cost. The charges mount up with satiric intensity; the net effect is to concede little real gain to society from the operation of its legal institutions.

The law man will find little new in the bills of particulars here filed against the courts, the bar, and the litigious process in general (Chs. II-V, VII), codification and "reform" through legislation (Chs. VI, VIII), and the administrative process (Ch. IX). He will not quarrel with most of the items of indictment, taken singly. But he need not be an unbending upholder of things as they are to feel that the book loses force in its many sweeping and dogmatic but debatable assertions of fact as to how the law works. Basically, the book carries less impact than it might because it includes no adequate analysis of the values in the light of which the "inefficiency" of the law is to be judged; instead these are left largely implicit in a way which too often seems to beg the issue. If the sole object of criminal law is to put men behind bars or under treatment, the criterion of efficiency of performance is of course clearcut enough. But if there is a social value in protecting individual freedom against official error, negligence, or malice, the criteria of efficient operation cannot be put so simply. It does not advance analysis to tag observance of the latter values as "inefficiency," condoned for purposes outside the legal order. The author has penetrating things to say about the extent to which the law is "inefficient" because men try to incorporate conflicting values in it. But this is the place at which to begin, rather than to end, discussion.

The book will serve the non-lawyer as a tightpacked, often pungent and witty summary of the leading insights of the literature of jurisprudence in this country of the last generation. Likewise, it reflects the dominantly negative character of that jurisprudence. Wise and learned in legal history, the author cautions and qualifies at various points of his indictment, but the qualifications are apt to be lost to any but the most informed reader, in the general tone of the book. Apart from the felt absence of a general definition of the criteria by which the law's efficiency is to be judged, the analysis suffers from not making explicit the author's theory of what makes society move. Especially it is not clear what is the book's theory of the comparative roles of man's contriving as against institutional inertia, in producing the "inefficiencies" described; the satiric bent of the style tends, more than the author probably intends, toward an innuendo that what happens, happens because of plots, plotters, or backstage maneuvers. This may be due partly to the fact that the weight of the indictment falls on the drama of lawsuits; treatment of legislation and the administrative process is relatively less detailed and is devoted in considerable part to features most analogous to litigation.

The author expresses wise cautions against exaggerating the creative role of law compared with other social institutions. Granting this, one need not believe that law is without major importance in helping set the framework within which social life goes on and the diverse energies of men find opportunity for release. "The law deals with the sickness of society," true (p. 164), but it deals also with the health of society, as it provides working procedures and instruments (e.g., the corporation), and defines the terms on which development may proceed (TVA, credit facilities, health regulation, for example). The author is entitled to choose a catalog of inefficiencies as his subject. But the breadth and detail of his catalog carries something more: an overall judgment against the net worth of the legal system. Taken within its own definition of its task, the book would carry more conviction if it were set in a more adequately stated perspective of the positive role of law in society.

The Politics of Agriculture; Soil Conservation and the Struggle for Power in Rural America. BY CHARLES M. HARDIN. (Glencoe, Illinois: The Free Press. 1952. Pp. 282. $4.00.)

Scholars who pass this book by as simply a case analysis of an agricultural program will be making a great mistake. For Hardin's volume is a rich study in public policy with implications for political understanding and methodology that far transcend the field of agriculture. Unlike much writing by political scientists which deals with the political or administrative process apart from substantive problems, this book focuses upon the values and interplay of relationships of interest groups and agencies that take place in moulding a politically volatile program. Moreover, it is written by a scholar whose analysis is not circumscribed by conventional disciplinary boundaries.

To effectually penetrate the maze of relationships and forces that permeate agricultural programs, Hardin limited his study to what might be regarded as a relatively non-controversial area, the field of soil conservation. But from the first chapter onward, it is apparent that the physical and engineering aspects of erosion control alone involve political issues of great magnitude. The first part of the book is an examination of the interest groups and agencies that are most directly concerned with the national soil conservation program, the colleges of agriculture, the Extension Service, the Farm Bureau, the Soil Conservation Service, the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, and its successor, the Production Marketing Administration. Here Hardin lays bare the power structure of these organizations—the ideology and representativeness of their membership, the quality of their leadership, their conflicts, alliances, and strategies for the purpose of controlling the farmers' use of the land and thereby the foundations of rural life. The second part of the book is devoted to an analysis of the policy-making process and the adequacy of conservation policies that emerge from a political environment dominated by vested interest groups. The difficulties that beset both Congress and the Department of Agriculture in ascertaining and formulating desirable policies for soil conservation amidst the ties and cleavages of congressional committees, agricultural agencies, and farm organizations are examined. Particular attention is paid to the appropriations procedure, the congressional hearing, and administrative reorganizations as instruments for achieving well-balanced policies. The final section of the book, entitled "Recommendations and General Interpretation," consists of two chapters, the first dealing with the need for reorientating soil conservation policies to the overall goals of farm family living, the second with the implications of the political-administrative pattern relating to agriculture for democratic government.

Individuals who are particularly interested in agriculture will wish to review in detail Hardin's far-reaching recommendations for changes in agricultural policy and administration. Suffice it to say that he finds the "configuration of political power and influence" which dominates agriculture unhealthy from the standpoint of wise public policy and the democratic process. Though he is properly appreciative of the wholesome relationships that have been built up over the years between the U. S. agricultural agencies and rural people, he argues that where these ties are maintained for the purpose of perpetuating vested organizational and group interests and where they "create obstacles to the development of general policy," they must be broken. To this end, he would separate the Extension Service and the Farm Bureau, abolish the election features of the P.M.A. committee system, break alliances between colleges of agriculture and special purpose groups, and change the relationships of S.C.S. to the National Association of Soil Conservation Districts. As alternatives he argues for more representatively planned congressional agricultural hearings, for a reorganization of the U. S. Department of Agriculture to break administrative power blocs within the Department, and for an agricultural program jointly formulated and administered by the agricultural colleges and the U.S.D.A.

For those who are more generally interested in political science, however, these are the points that will stand out in Hardin's book: First, that the scientific and technical aspects of public programs cannot be divorced from broad social considerations, either in policy-making or in administration; second, that in complex programs the synthesizing of policy involves both centralizing and decentralizing processes; third, that the objectives and success of administrative agencies cannot be viewed apart from the "organization and distribution of political power in this country"; fourth, that the centers of policy-making in our governmental structure must always be buttressed by sufficient political and administrative power to offset the drives of special interest groups; and fifth, that government agencies and interest groups must police one another to control power and foster the representative character of organizations.

The analysis and documentation give proof that this book was the product of over a decade of research. To be sure, it contains much that is controversial and many "heads are cracked" in the process, but one must agree nevertheless with M. L. Wilson in his tone-setting foreword that this is a well-balanced study. Students of both politics and administration will do well to apply Hardin's meaningful approach to the problems of agriculture to other fields of public policy.

American Foreign Policy and the Separation of Powers. BY DANIEL S. CHEEVER AND H. FIELD HAVILAND, JR. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1952. Pp. xii, 244. $3.75.)

A noted scientist once remarked that if you catch fish of only a certain size in your net, it proves more about the size of the openings in the net than about the size of the fish in the sea. A great many political scientists, by ignoring this maxim, have misunderstood some of the most important problems in government organization. Since official surveys have usually done their fishing only within the executive departments, scholars have too often ignored the problems arising from the relations of the departments with the Congress.

Messrs. Cheever and Haviland, however, after working on the Foreign Affairs Task Force of the Hoover Commission, saw what the Commission's assignment did not let it study in detail—that the problem of organizing the federal government for foreign affairs was not one that depended entirely, or even primarily, on internal executive organization. They have worked up their courage to deal, in a book of only 244 pages, with the much more difficult area of legislative-executive relations.

Their book consists of, first, a brief sketch of the constitutional framework and administrative organization through which foreign affairs are conducted. Next, in a series of historical case studies, it discusses the way in which our system of legislative-executive relations has affected the conduct of foreign relations from 1789 to the present, giving special emphasis to the crucial decisions in foreign policy of the last few decades. Finally, it analyzes the more important constitutional and administrative issues. Thus the authors paint a picture in broad strokes of the participation not only of the entire executive branch in foreign affairs, but also of the Congress and many of its committees.

In several ways the authors' approach is a useful one. First of all, they show that the problem of coordinating the executive branch of the government depends on the even more difficult problem of coordinating congressional committees. As they say "... the Foreign Relations and Foreign Affairs Committees are at present unable to draw together the many elements of foreign-policy activity on Capitol Hill. . . . Other committees jealously guard their prerogatives regarding matters that increasingly are involved in foreign policy, and the Department of State can neglect them only at its peril."

The authors note, too, the effect on international affairs of seemingly technical or procedural details—for example, the rules of the Senate providing an easy procedure for amending a treaty, and the practice of enacting bills not as permanent legislation but with frequent dates of expiration in order to bring executive business more under the influence of congressional committees.

Most important, they take into account the impact of Congress on the internal administration of the executive branch, especially through its powers of investigation. In doing so, they have had to rely mainly on political and diplomatic history for their material; their analysis of such points would be much stronger if more material were available like Leonard White's administrative histories, or the studies of the Committee on Public Administration Cases—both of which the authors use as much as they can.

By such an approach, which is quite different from that of those who study either diplomacy or administration in a constitutional vacuum, the authors come to a generally realistic appraisal of their problem, and avoid the temptation to prescribe some of the usual constitutional cure-alls.

In this respect, however, the authors' conclusions are a triumph of their common sense over their fundamental theory. As the title indicates, their guiding hypothesis is the question whether the separation of powers is not the principal difficulty in the administration of our foreign policy. But they do not define the problem precisely enough to see whether the trouble is really the separation of powers as prescribed in the Constitution, or the various detailed checks and balances which have developed historically.

If the separation of powers is the fundamental trouble, the only real remedy is to adopt a unification of powers. But which variety? The authors note the great difference between the French and British types of unification of powers; in various passages they seem to fear the French version more than they envy the British. In specific terms their main worry is about the ways in which Congress fails to coordinate itself, and congressional committees make difficulties in the conduct of foreign affairs. In matters like this, of course, the French legislature and its committees, in spite of the unification of powers in France, are much more like their American than like their British counterparts.

The authors had no trouble in deciding to recommend a constitutional amendment to abolish the two-thirds rule for the ratification of treaties. By contrast, after setting themselves the problem of the separation of powers, they seemed to fumble the issue, recognizing that any attempt to adopt a parliamentary system of government would "produce a hybrid that might create more problems than it would solve." It is a pity that, having come to this sensible conclusion in spite of their hypothesis, they did not go back and make their statement of the theoretical issue more precise, and perhaps even revise their title accordingly.

Nevertheless, American Foreign Policy and the Separation of Powers is a book that was certainly worth doing. It is as difficult as it is necessary to tackle the problems in which the fields of international affairs, constitutional law, and public administration are related to each other. This book is one that will be suggestive and stimulating to the scholar and interesting to the general reader.

Titoism and the Cominform. BY ADAM B. ULAM. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1952. Pp. viii, 243. $4.00.)

Tito's Communism. BY JOSEF KORBEL. (Denver: The University of Denver Press. 1951. Pp. viii, 368. $4.00.)

Set against the broad historical perspective of Eastern Europe, these two appraisals of Titoism offer an interesting and lively study in contrasts. Aided by the tools of precise and distinguished scholarship, Professor Ulam probes profoundly, while ex-Ambassador Korbél's personalized approach to the intricate problems of Titoism moves on a lighter and primarily biographical plane. On the one hand, Titoism and the Cominform is bound to enrich the doctrinal contents of Eastern European political research; and on the other, Tito's Communism will contribute to the storehouse of practical illustrations drawn from field-work. Students of this area stand to profit considerably from both volumes, despite their sharp differentiation in methodology, scholarship and theoretical conclusions.

In Dr. Ulam's work the reviewer is most favorably impressed by the combination of comprehensive knowledge and purposeful modesty which serves to narrow the all-too-broad scope of research on the entire satellite area of Eastern Europe. Ulam wisely centers his attention on the Communist parties of Yugoslavia, Poland and Bulgaria, touching only tangentially on the most pertinent pro- and anti-Titoist developments and personalities in such countries as Hungary and Rumania. The author's choice of primary targets is amply justified by his own linguistic skills and academic predispositions, as well as by the depth and extent of the Titoist movement in the countries of his selection. In a field noted for indiscriminate and omnivorous, rather than careful and systematic research methods, Professor Ulam's attempt to avoid the pitfalls of uncharted territories is praiseworthy indeed.

In this reviewer's opinion the two salient points of Titoism and the Cominform are the thoughtful analysis of the crisis of June, 1948, which decisively shattered the solidarity of the communist bloc and "raised in the outside world a variety of hopeful expectations, some reasonable, others fantastic" (p. 107), and the detailed discussion of analogous crisis symptoms which have emerged in the Polish Communist party. The latter slowly but inevitably paved the way for the explosive Gomulka conflict and for the political demise of the party's powerful Secretary General. These highlights of the book are successfully buttressed by accounts of such secondary phenomena as the Rajk trial in Hungary, the Kostov case in Bulgaria, and the first rumblings of massive, top-to-bottom "purges to come" in Czechoslovakia and Rumania.

In the final chapter of his work Professor Ulam examines Titoism as a current historical phenomenon. Here he is obviously beset by one of the principal problems and irritants of scholars in the Eastern European field. In a political area where the doctrine of ceaseless change appears as the only feature of continuum or permanence, it is almost impossible to formulate judgments sub specie aeternitatis. Thus it is particularly difficult to categorize and evaluate Titoism in a definitive manner since in its initial four-and-a-half year phase this movement could barely afford to harden its ideological arteries. The author by necessity confines himself to a few cautious and tentative conclusions. He correctly diagnoses Titoism as "a grave and recurrent but not fatal disease of Communism" (p. 232), whose political character and long-range historic impact cannot be fully determined at this point. Dr. Ulam's book is meticulously documented throughout; it also has a first-rate bibliographical note and a useful index.

In his Tito's Communism, Josef Korbel retraces his personal experiences as Czechoslovak Ambassador to Yugoslavia in the immediate post-war period. Beyond the now familiar discussion of the partisan movement the author succeeds in drawing a valuable political profile of Tito, rich in minor details and helpful in interpreting the enigmatic conduct of the Marshal. The most important chapters are those dealing with the Yugoslav Communist party and its leaders, religion, the silencing of the opposition, Tito's foreign policy, and the "heresy" itself, climaxed by Tito's determined struggle against the Cominform. The weakest and least instructive sections are those concerned with politics and the law, economic affairs, and foreign trade. Here the author contributes little to the vast body of information now generally available on Yugoslavia.

One of Dr. Korbel's principal observations concerns the nature of the struggle between Stalin and Tito. In his opinion the background of the conflict is primarily psychological and not ideological or economic. Even while the Communist party of Yugoslavia gave full support to the expansionist and aggressive foreign policy of the U.S.S.R., "Moscow failed to understand that Marshal Tito . . . national hero and dictator, was a different person from Josip Broz, once underground agent of the Third International" (p. 300).

Although Tito's Communism is a significant work, a halting and uncertain use of the English language detracts from its overall value. Careful editing could have improved immeasurably the general readability of the book, whose fund of lively information and timely ideas should appeal both to the non-specialist and to the student of Eastern European politics.

Revolution in China. BY CHARLES PATRICK FITZGERALD. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1952. Pp. ix, 290. $4.50.)

Although the author of Revolution in China disclaims intention to present in it a history of the Chinese revolution, he avoids the error of confusing the Chinese revolution with some particular phase of it. Thus his generalizations are in relation to a continuing process. Possibly because he believes that "Revolution in China is primarily the concern of the Chinese people, who suffer, or benefit, from its result" (p. viii), he tends to view it, in its several phases, as finding its causation in the Chinese environment even where it can be viewed as a reaction against Western imperialism. In this respect he is particularly concerned that its present communist phase be appraised as fundamentally Chinese rather than deriving strength or weakness from the soundness or lack of wisdom of Russian direction and support, or as something that may fall apart in terms of Sino-Soviet rivalries.

Mr. Fitzgerald's thesis as to revolution in China, from the point of view of success or failure, is that it grows out of the problems of livelihood of a peasant population and is given direction and content by the scholar class. Thus there is success in the attainment of revolutionary objectives when the two classes come into satisfactory combination against the established order. The Kuomintang was successful in combining the two elements against the war-lords, reformulating the national tradition in terms of nationalism. "The military rule had alienated both scholars and peasants; it had defied every moral restraint and outraged every hope of improvement; it was the direct cause of the second phase of the Chinese Revolution" (p. 44). But this combination was almost immediately broken up because of the failure of the Kuomintang to develop a program of reform in the interest of the peasantry. As the author puts it: "But the land problem, the peasants and their poverty remained virtually as before. There was as yet no new institution which promised to restore the fallen power of civilian control, there was no ideology to cement the new society, no objective beyond a distant and unreal promise of a democratic constitution and the still unsatisfied demands of nationalism" (p. 61). In his view, the split which occurred in 1927-28 was what destroyed the unity between peasants and scholars. "The peasants, suppressed and uncared for by the reaction, rallied to the Communist Party, when, a little later, that party dropped its dogma and took note of reality. The scholars, the educated class, still imbued with nationalism and believing that the Kuomintang was the party which stood for an independent China rather than subservience to Russian orders, rallied around the new regime in Nanking or at least held off from the Communists" (p. 61). But when Japanese pressures began to be applied, it was the Communist party, not the Kuomintang, which first preached the doctrine of national resistance. The Communists also enlisted the support of the peasantry through propagandizing and putting into effect a program of reform in areas under their control, thus standing for "the people" in enlargement of their role as the party of the proletariat. The scholars, especially those of student age, began to move over to the Communist party during the period of national resistance to Japan. This movement was completed as disillusionment with the Kuomintang as the instrument of national reconstruction and regeneration set in after VJ Day. By 1949, consequently, peasants and scholars had been brought together in support of the Communists as the party of revolution.

This thesis and its application in analysis of the several phases of the Chinese revolution are what give significance to Mr. Fitzgerald's study rather than additional information on the inception and the course of the revolution. He presents a point of view which cannot be disregarded, whether or not it is completely accepted, by the student of Chinese development. This is also true of the analysis which he makes, which in some respects presents a fresh method of approach to the Chinese revolution. From this point of view his analysis of "Christianity in the Chinese Revolution" (Ch. 5) and of "Revolution and Orthodoxy" (Ch. 6) is most important. On the other hand, his analysis is incomplete because of his failure to devote special attention to the scholar class as such from the point of view of changes in its composition and training and of the effects on it and its role of the social and economic changes in China resulting from the Western impact. A corresponding weakness of the treatment results from almost complete failure to relate analytically the changing social and economic aspects of the revolutionary process in each phase to the political and ideological. These failures, and some misstatements, do not, however, take away its significance from the book. While it cannot be viewed as the definitive treatment of the Chinese revolution, it is a study with which every serious student needs to be familiar.

The American Record in the Far East, 1945-1951. By KENNETH SCOTT LATOURETTE. (New York: The Macmillan Company. 1952. Pp. 208. $3.00.)

If the new national administration were inclined to brief itself on the past six years of our Asiatic policy, it would do well to require this concise appraisal as a reading. But if its purpose were further to discredit the statesmanship of Acheson or the policies of Truman, it might better ignore this book.

Professor Latourette brings to his latest volume a lifetime of scholarship in Asiatic affairs. Though his scholarship is not obtrusive, it is clear that only substantial erudition would make it possible to draw out the main strands of our policy in eleven brief essays.

In the complex fabric of past relations in Asia the author finds three strands: bipartisan policy in the Far East, an ever-widening scope of American action, and more consistent American intervention than in Europe. Following Japan's defeat the emergence of Asiatic nationalisms, the spread of communism, and the polarization of the world's power made our embroilment in Asia more difficult. Latourette cuts through the maze of discussion over recent policy to conclude that we have had a "consistent and comprehensive policy." The seeming confusion is attributed to the nature of the democratic process, which necessarily and rightly thrusts into the public arena many voices and many points of view. The principles he discerns are these: (1) an identification of the interests of Americans with the interests of Asiatics, (2) the containment of communism, (3) the use of armed force in such containment when it appeared essential, (4) awareness that our policy in Asia should not be executed in a vacuum but should be an integral part of our world-wide policy, (5) defense of American territory, and (6) fulfillment of our obligations as a member of the United Nations.

In describing the application of these main policy principles Latourette devotes a chapter or more to each region. In his evaluation of American administration of the Philippines, he cautiously indicates our success in education, public health and public works and our failure in agrarian reform. It is regrettable that there is no mention of the contributions of Magsaysay, both in combating the Hukbalahap menace and in raising the standards of government. His analysis of our record in Japan is unusually well-balanced and perceptive. He is not hesitant to praise MacArthur as the administrative genius of the occupation—which indeed he was. Neither does he hesitate to approve his removal as Supreme Commander, saying that his recall was salutary in Japan as an object lesson in civilian control of the military. The political reforms begun in Japan were well conceived; the problems remaining are largely economic. In Indonesia and Indochina our inclinations against colonialism are overridden by our efforts to contain communism; hence we incur the disaffection of India by supporting the Dutch and the French.

It was our policy in China which suffered the greatest defeat. But the communist victory is by no means a direct result of American policy. The author points out the great ideological vacuum existing in China because of the decline of Confucianism, a decline largely the result of the intrusion of Western culture. Coupled with a growing intolerance of foreign imperialism, it created an ideal situation for the spread of communism. Latourette implies that the superior discipline and dedication of the Communists appealed effectively to the Chinese masses. He doubts if we could have pursued a policy different from that followed, although he concedes some mistakes were made. The United States would have had a "cleaner record" had we not sanctioned Russian re-entry into Manchuria by the Yalta agreement, but Latourette feels that Manchuria most certainly would have been controlled by the Chinese Communists who perhaps would have let in the Russians even if there had been no Yalta commitments. The chapter on China ends on a note of optimism. Communism is by no means the last stage of the Chinese revolution, and the influence of American democracy has been subtle but profound. Certainly the history of China conquered by Mongols and later by Manchus holds some hope for the belief that what results from the impact of Russian communism on Chinese culture will be a variant not very much like the former. But the pervasive penetration of communism may be different in quality than the impact of other alien cultures in Chinese history. The Mongols had no exportable piety of messianic quality. The Manchus easily absorbed Confucian techniques if not values. The differences between communism and earlier infusions of foreign ideologies cast doubt on how repetitive history may be in this instance.

Korea, that "Land of Morning Calm," in which there has been no real calm for half a century and more, is treated with perception and sympathy, and our policy there is defended.

Professor Latourette offers no solution to our problems in Asia except to approve the general direction of our policy. While conceding certain errors of judgment, these he ascribes to our impatience as a people, our immaturity as a nation, and partisan distortions.

Students of Asiatic affairs are deeply indebted to the American Institute of Pacific Relations for making this publication possible, and to Professor Latourette for reducing a maze of conflicting complexities to comprehensible essentials.

The Australian Party System. BY LOUISE OVERACKER. (New Haven: Yale University Press. 1952. Pp. xiii, 373. $5.00.)

Over the years a few political scientists have found in Australian government and politics subjects of unique interest. In Australia a British-type cabinet government is based upon an American-type written, federal constitution; voting is compulsory; appeal from the Australian courts to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is possible still; the control of public finance has become centralized to a degree that would seem incompatible with a federal system; and since federation in 1901 Australian governments have been willing to experiment with various schemes for nationalization, regulation, and social welfare. Now a first analysis of Australian parties—which have some unique features of their own—comes as a valuable aid to understanding many of the unusual political developments; and students who have not worked in Australia, and experienced the serious lack of documentation, memoirs, and basic research, will hardly appreciate the great effort required to produce the volume.

Professor Overacker's study is concerned essentially with the development of Australian political parties and a description of their present organization and methods of operation, as the succeeding summary of some of the salient points in her discussion will show. The Labor party is the most permanent feature of Australian politics, for non-Labor parties, although governing nationally for about 34 of the 52 years, have formed, dissolved, and reappeared under new names. Consequently, Labor origins, programs, and organization are explored more exhaustively than those of the other parties. This is justified by Professor Overacker's view that "The matrix of Australian politics is the Labor Party, and Australian politics reflects working-class rather than middle-class thinking." Causes for this are the working-class origins of most Australian settlers, the lack of an agricultural class of small property owners, the early domination of Australian economic life by large monopolies or combines—often controlled from overseas—and the failure of the great strikes of the 1890's. From this background developed a class consciousness and class unity that is strong and bitter even today, and that gave rise to a disciplined—although not always doctrinally harmonious—Labor party.

At first Labor was a third party trading support for favors from one of the others, but by 1910 Andrew Fisher led a Labor majority and henceforth Labor was the party to be reckoned with. A Labor government split over conscription during the First World War and Hughes led a wing of the group into a successful new Nationalist party; a Labor government again divided over depression policies and right-wing Laborites followed Lyons from the Cabinet into a successful new United Australia party; throughout the 20's and 30's both unions and party were weakened by right-left divisions, there were frequent struggles between unions and party, and occasional disputes marked state and federal party relations. Out of all this came, however, the insistence on majority rule and party discipline that in 1943 and 1946 brought political dividends, if sometimes only "artificial unity." Party candidates pledge in writing to support the party program, endorsement by the party executive of all candidates is required, and all parliamentary party moves (including the choice of leader and of cabinet members) are based on majority decisions in caucus. These procedures are followed nationally and in the states.

Since 1919 a minority Country party—a party that "guards its independence jealously, drives a hard bargain, and exerts an influence which is negative as well as conservative"—has held enough seats to prevent any other non-Labor party from governing except in coalition. Such coalitions have been marked usually by bickering and friction, although the present Liberal-Country government has displayed fewer differences than usual.

The new Liberal party, growing out of a united opposition to certain Labor proposals for constitutional amendment, and out of a series of "unity conferences" stimulated by opposition leader Robert Menzies, was born in 1945. By close cooperation with the Country party, a "me too" program in support of Labor's social legislation, and by capitalizing on public discontent with certain Labor policies (notably continued petrol rationing and efforts at bank nationalization), Labor was defeated in 1949 and again in 1951. It is more likely that the Liberal party will survive defeat than was true of earlier non-Labor parties, for the party has attempted to build strong organizations in each state, to divest itself of the charge that Melbourne business finances and controls it, to interest women in greater political activity, to recruit promising younger men as the party's candidates in many areas, and to build a national secretariat to carry on continuous research and publicity.

Rather surprisingly, Australian Labor has never created such a secretariat and there is no Australian equivalent of Transport House. Further, Australian Labor has tended to be hostile to "intellectuals" and most active Labor politicians still come to office via the trade union route. This has handicapped the development of more effective leadership. On the other hand, Menzies and Fadden (Country party leader) also have been criticized for keeping power in "old hands" and not allowing younger members a greater role in party decisions. The government parties also caucus; and while discipline is not so formally exercised as it is by Labor, the practical result is about the same.

One might wish that Professor Overacker had attempted to describe the general outlook and expectation from life of the "average Australian," for his attitude profoundly influences the Australian political climate and leadership, but such an ambitious effort is perhaps better reserved for an entire book. Others will feel that her admiration for the Labor party stems in great measure from respect for its aims and ideals of an earlier day, and that too little criticism is levied against the present labor movement for its frequent failure to act in the national interest and for lack of constructive leadership. But minor criticism aside, this extremely useful study has brought together for the first time an immense amount of detail, and it is certain that Australian scholars as well as American will welcome this full and orderly explanation of the Australian party system.

Christian Democracy in Italy and France. BY MARIO EINAUDI AND FRANÇOIS GOGUEL. (Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press. 1952. Pp. x, 229. $4.00.)

Because the pragmatism and materialism of the liberal philosophy and its socialist offshoot were irreconcilable with Catholic metaphysics and also were mortal enemies of the traditional regimes with which the Church had established a modus vivendi, the spread of dogmatic individualist and collectivist thinking in the 19th century had the effect of excluding practicing Catholics for generations from political participation in France and Italy. In these nominally completely Catholic countries the entire political class was avowedly hostile to the Church. Until well into the present century Church policy was frequently applied in ways which discouraged participation by communicants in any but the most traditional and undemocratic political movements.

Certain developments have recently altered this situation. Dogmatic individualism, or "economic liberalism," suffered its death blow in the disappearance of the true world market in the period between the world wars. Dogmatic collectivism somewhat later ceased to pass as a democratic trend, once the true costs exacted by the Russian Communist transformation became widely known and believed. The Church lost any hope of the revival of the older type of traditional regime, toward accommodation with which its policy had formerly been directed. In these circumstances large-scale Catholic political movements professing democratic principles and social reformistic aims suddenly became major factors in the politics of postwar Italy and France.

The Popular Republican Movement in France and the Christian Democratic party in Italy profess a positive doctrinal unity embodied in Christian principles. To the English-speaking observer, however, accustomed to such professions as a normal feature of politics, their most notable characteristic is their failure to fit the pattern of dogmatic differentiation between individualists and collectivists, previously universal in continental democratic politics. Here are parties very much of the English or American pattern, professing no precise political doctrine and securing support from widely differentiated segments of the social structure. Not only must they be accepted as sincerely democratic in aim, but insofar as successful democracy in the stable democratic regimes has been embodied primarily in the compromise of clashing viewpoints and in the adjustment of conflicting group claims, these parties appear as almost the first beginnings of practical democratic politics in the countries involved.

Unfortunately the recent strength of this trend is an accident of European political history, and it is by no means certain that European publics will readily accept for long an undogmatic politics or that the leaders and subleaders of Christian Democracy are undogmatic through choice and not merely because of a lack of long exposure to the political battlefield. Many traditionalists in France before the creation of the separate Gaulist movement supported the P.R.M. as the least dangerous of the various reformist trends which monopolized politics immediately after the war. A similar temporary Fascist vote undoubtedly inflated the early Christian Democratic plurality in Italy. A large part of the activists of both movements (necessarily so in the case of Italy) have an abnormally short backlog of political experience.

In the present book the relatively short and possibly meteoric careers of the two Christian Democratic parties are analyzed with critical realism. Some cautious attempts are made to forecast their futures. Only the Italian party has in any real sense been in power. It would appear that its record will not be attractive enough to secure for it a renewed parliamentary majority. This prospect depends to a great extent upon the handling of economic and social reform questions by the de Gasperi government. These questions and the legislation and administration in respect to them are inadequately explained, most attention being given to constitutional questions and to party organization. In France the P.R.M. has a reformist record of a more definable character dating from its association with the Socialists and Communists in the immediate post-war coalitions. Perhaps for this reason the treatment of this movement seems more complete and less weighted toward purely political or doctrinal matters.

International Technical Assistance; Programs and Organization. BY WALTER R. SHARP. (Chicago: Public Administration Service. 1952. Pp. xi, 146. $2.50.)

Dr. Walter R. Sharp has performed a considerable service by preparing the best published "global inventory" of the organization and operation of the principal technical assistance programs through 1951. The volume will be especially useful to those depending upon published material in their professional work, in view of the "public relations" and "congressional presentation" character of most of the information released by the government during the past two years.

The best chapter, in the opinion of the reviewer, is the one on the United Nations program. The sections on the Technical Cooperation Administration program (U. S.) and the Far Eastern program of the M.S.A.(E.C.A.) are also very well done. The material presented on the Colombo Plan programs and those of the Organization of American States is useful and informative. Many classic problems of public management are illustrated and described as they have appeared in the operation of these programs. The appalling complexity, resulting in part from the participation in program management of so many governments and international organizations, as well as their parts and sub-parts, is abundantly exemplified. One is tempted to remark, "Seldom have so many administered so little."

Professor Sharp appears less successful in "identifying the chief administrative difficulties that have had to be faced," and in offering "tentative suggestions as to . . . improving their operation." According to the Foreword, this volume was intended only to lay the basis for such a difficult task. Nevertheless, it may be questioned whether the disclaimer of concern with the "rationale of technical assistance" and with "the substantive impact of major aid programs" was wise, in view of the ultimate objective. Perhaps the Public Administration Clearing House is more interested in "management" than in "administration." At any rate, if our concern is with basic analysis pointing to solutions of major difficulties in program administration, do we not have to attend, on the one hand, to the political realities which condition basic governmental structure, and, on the other, to objectives sought and the subject-matter fields being dealt with?

It is certainly important to be clear and discriminating in categorizing the programs whose administration is being surveyed and analyzed. As Herbert Emmerich once remarked, the term "technical assistance suffers from imprecise definition." The term "Point-Four" arose as a result of a political or editorial accident. At times Dr. Sharp appears to focus on commodity grant and financial aid programs, while at other times he is dealing quite directly with cultural interchange. Private agency programs are included in the historical background chapter but omitted from the others. The discussion of the United States' agency and committee structure is pitched to the totality of its foreign aid programs, of which technical assistance programs are only a small part. Recently much attention has been given to integrating in an organizational sense foreign aid programs with the administration of other branches of foreign economic policy, such as commercial policy. In view of the emphasis placed in this book on the recipient country as a major focus for program integration and coordination, one may question whether technical assistance should be a primary category for purposes of program and organization analysis.

Insufficient attention is given to the role of the field of governmental administration and its linkage with social and economic programs, as for example in the "Bolivian operation." No mention is made of the part that political science and political economy might properly play. In the opinion of the reviewer these topics deserve fuller and more critical attention by the distinguished author of International Technical Assistance, his associates and sponsors, and many others. Aside from the potentialities for more specialized contributions from such persons, comparative political economy and governmental administration provide perhaps the best springboards from which to approach the entire institutional side of underdeveloped area programs and to bring overall country programs into line with multiple objectives.

BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Intergovernmental Relations in Public Health.
By LAURENCE WYATT. (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1951. Pp. ix, 212. $3.50.)

Intergovernmental Relations in Social Welfare.
By RUTH RAUP. (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1952. Pp. ix, 234. $3.00.)

Intergovernmental Relations in Employment Security. By FRANCIS E. ROURKE. (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1952. Pp. viii, 133. $2.50.)

These three research monographs, the most recently published in the Minnesota series, provide useful and, on occasion, interesting, additions to the literature of intergovernmental relations. As for form, they are well constructed; each is well indexed, and each contains an extensive bibliography. For the most part, the style is simple, the exposition straightforward and easy to follow. More vigorous editing might well have eliminated some of the overly-lengthy discussions of general concepts of American constitutional law and government, and the occasional digressions into matters tangential to the declared subjects of the studies. These are not, however, serious flaws.

Particularly commendable is the evident care with which research has been done into the formal aspects of intergovernmental relations, such as the plans or work programs required by higher levels of government, the audits and administrative reviews, the statistical reports, and the inspections. Federal requirements in each of these programs have been painstakingly digested. As to state requirements of local governments, descriptions of the Minnesota arrangements should at least suggest a starting point for studies in other states.

Considerable attention is paid also to the informal relationships, particularly with field representatives. The extent to which field representation may succeed in decentralizing the supervision of a cooperative program is well demonstrated in Miss Raup's study (pp. 64-69).

The monographs on social welfare and employment security contain, the first as an appendix, the second as a part of the concluding chapter, results of questionnaires sent to appropriate state and national officials to test hypotheses concerning intergovernmental relationships which had suggested themselves to the authors during their study. Mr. Rourke's discussion of the value of such questionnaires and the need for caution in their use merits attention (p. 107).

Finally, these monographs, when read within a short span of time so that all three are relatively fresh in the mind, are highly suggestive as to differences in the overall character of intergovernmental relationships in specific programs. Mr. Wyatt characterizes these relationships in health as being generally very happy for all concerned. It is a rare occasion when supervision from a higher level of government assumes a heavy-handed form calculated to ruffle the tempers of those supervised. Wyatt emphasizes that officials engaged in administering public health programs much prefer persuasion to coercion. These are observations borne out by other studies of intergovernmental relations in health. Harmony in intergovernmental relations can, of course, be quite deceptive, for not infrequently it is a harmony flowing from the absence or laxness of effective supervision. For example, so long as many southern state health officials are permitted to blink the requirements of the Hospital Survey and Construction Act concerning facilities for Negroes, they will remain quite content. In the meantime, however, an important objective of the federal legislation will have been defeated.

Mr. Rourke's research showed much suspicion and resentment existing between the state and federal governments in the field of employment security. His exposition of the factors and special circumstances making for these feelings is well done. In the opinion of this reviewer, Miss Raup has shown the most subtle understanding of the complexities of intergovernmental relationships. Her study reveals a full appreciation of the interplay of force and persuasion, and of those conditions which can make for a willingness to cooperate as well as those which may give rise to the most stubborn opposition. Miss Raup, moreover, has made some effort to describe the sometimes rather devious effects which requirements made by higher levels of government can have upon the overall structure and operations of other governments.—VALERIE A. EARLE, University of Alabama.

The Group Basis of Politics; A Study in Basing-Point Legislation. BY EARL LATHAM. (Ithaca, N. Y.: Cornell University Press. 1952. Pp. ix, 244. $3.75.)

In this study of the passage in Congress and the veto by President Truman of a bill to "clarify" (i.e., weaken) governmental handling of basing-point arrangements, Earl Latham does an excellent job of tracing the twistings and windings of the American legislative process. To students of legislation much of the ground and fauna are familiar: the flux of group interests; the complex strands of interaction and influence, the splits within and between official and non-official groups, the role of confusion and ignorance on the one hand and of expertise and parliamentary craft on the other, the importance of key personalities in the legislative process, the sense of group interest on the part of House and Senate.

Familiar—yet with a difference. For surely, as Latham suggests, the story of this bill is anomalous, even for Congress: "... an important measure seemingly sponsored by Democratic officialdom was opposed by a majority of the Democrats in Congress and finally vetoed by a Democratic president. The other side of the paradox is the fact that the minority party commanded a majority of the votes under the auspices of majority party leadership" (p. 210). There was an interesting split between the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice, and the Administration's position was obscure until the veto. No wonder the Congressmen were confused.

Equally anomalous was the handling of the bill from the standpoint of procedural due process. It received no hearings in the Senate and no public hearings in the House Judiciary Committee. The only public hearings on the measure were held by a committee that had no jurisdiction over it, and these, Latham feels, were useless as a basis for intelligent policymaking. Legislation was steamrollered through the House and almost steamrollered through the Senate. The data Latham describes raise sharp questions about the capacity of Congress to publicize or clarify policy questions, to pose meaningful alternatives, and to deliberate and legislate in an orderly fashion.

The book has several great virtues. Latham's graceful scholarship and his sardonic insights make the book come alive. The first chapter, "Group Conflict and the Political Process," (substantially reprinted in this REVIEW, June, 1952, under the title "The Group Basis of Politics: Notes for a Theory") is a useful survey of work in this field, with excellent bibliographical notes and with due attention to the important progress made in other fields than political science. On the other hand, his concluding chapter, "Politics as Process," while offering interesting conclusions on the bill itself, carries group theory no further than where it left off at the end of Chapter 1. Secondly, aside from an admirable treatment of the Cement Institute, the book does not go behind the scenes of congressional policymaking in the manner, for example, of Stephen K. Bailey's study of the Employment Act. Such a study of key legislators and their constituencies might have cleared up some of the mysteries surrounding the bill. Unhappily it would call for more time and money than the average college professor can afford.—JAMES MACGREGOR BURNS, Williams College.

Conscription in the United States; Historical Background. BY JACK FRANKLIN LEACH. (Tokyo, Japan, and Rutland, Vermont: Charles E. Tuttle Publishing Co. 1952. Pp. x, 501. $5.75.)

The history of the subject—in public discussion down to the Civil War, and then in practice—is here set out competently and in detail. The high points are the early scheme of Henry Knox for compulsory service in the militia, Secretary Monroe's plan for conscription near the close of "Mr. Madison's War," and finally, in the Civil War, after all lesser expedients had failed, the draft law of March 3, 1863. The account ends at Appomattox, with a glance forward to the eventual determination in 1918 of the constitutional validity of conscription. The author regards compulsory service as a just and necessary measure.

The research was pursued with an intensity and scope quite unusual for a dissertation. The examination of newspaper files was notably thorough. Litigation was an important part of the story of raising the Union army; Dr. Leach has dug out many instances not found in the reports, although his hand is not at its firmest when dealing with legal questions. The exercise of greater mastery in managing the material—e.g., in recounting debates—would have facilitated the reader's grasp of essentials. The book is, however, in the writing as in the research, a substantial and an honest work.

"Even in World War II and the Korean War, after Americans had become used to a great deal of regimentation and control, some still fret at and use their ingenuity to avoid a draft which is infinitely fairer than that of the Civil War," writes Dr. Leach in his chapter of conclusions. "Americans were not, at the time of the Civil War, and are not yet fully aware of the necessity of paying a heavy price for the right to live in a free land. They have not wholly digested the truism that every privilege has its correlative duty; that enjoyment of life, liberty and property in a democracy carries with it the reciprocal obligation to fight for this Republic's preservation against all enemies, foreign or domestic." If the wrong-headedness with which Madison and Lincoln had to contend manifests itself even now in public discussion, Dr. Leach's book serves, at any rate, to remind us of one of the aspects of national defense in which we have developed maturity and strength.—CHARLES FAIRMAN, Stanford University.

Equality by Statute; Legal Controls over Group Discrimination. BY MORRIS BERGER. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1952. Pp. xii, 238. $3.25.)

Professor Berger, who teaches sociology at Princeton, has made a welcome contribution to the growing body of literature in the civil rights field. The first three chapters, comprising about half the book, are concerned largely with Supreme Court cases dealing with aspects of American class relations. Following a general contrast between the status of civil rights today and during the Reconstruction Era, Mr. Berger summarizes in the second chapter the Supreme Court cases of the period 1868-1937, which in the main tended to buttress the caste order (to use the author's phrase), and then in the third chapter surveys the decisions from 1937 to 1950, which have been in the direction of undermining the caste order. The cases are described carefully and in an orderly way, but on the whole the first half of the book covers familiar ground. The real contribution of the book is in the long fourth chapter, which analyzes in detail the New York (Ives-Quinn) law against discrimination, adopted in 1945, and its administration by the State Commission Against Discrimination during the first five and a half years. While Mr. Berger carefully points out the difficulties of evaluation, nevertheless he reaches the conclusion that the law has been effective in achieving a substantial measure of its objectives. The Commission seems to have scored its greatest success in regard to discrimination by unions, and to have had its greatest difficulties with employment agencies. That the Commission is committed to an educational and conciliatory role, and is unwilling to use the sanctions provided for in the law, is made perfectly clear. The final chapter, drawing upon recent studies by sociologists, psychoanalysts and social psychologists, affirms very strongly, as a scientifically tenable proposition, that discrimination can be controlled by law.—DAVID FELLMAN, University of Wisconsin.

Commentaries on the Constitution; 1790-1860. BY ELIZABETH KELLEY BAUER. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1952. Pp. 400. $4.75.)

Prior to the Civil War, expositions of the Constitution by members of the bar and bench were primary sources for legal training and important media of constitutional interpretation. The author's purpose, in what is apparently her doctoral dissertation, is to place the constitutional commentaries written between 1790 and 1860 "in their historical setting, to trace the lives of the men who wrote them, to compare them with respect to a few major theories, and to sketch the uses to which they were put when men were aware of their existence." Any one of these several objects requires its own volume. It is questionable if much of significance could be said in the few pages assigned to each.

The discussion of the historical setting consists in little more than a notation of the dates on which the several works were published and a statement that there was a conflict between northerners and southerners over constitutional interpretation. The thirteen brief biographical sketches, about half of the book, include such well known men as Wilson, Kent, Story, and Taylor, as well as some less well known commentators like Peter Stephen Du Ponceau and David Hoffman. Little is added to what we already know about the former, and there is little indication of why we should bother to learn more about the latter. The commentaries themselves are summarized under the topics of "location of sovereignty" and "compact vs. supreme law theory." Story's Commentaries on the Constitution are outlined, and in a short but careful discussion of their uses, the author indicates the cases in which the commentaries were cited by members of the bar and justices of the Supreme Court.

Although the author sticks primarily to a summary of what the several commentators wrote, occasionally she lapses into the "real-reason approach"—an occupational hazard—with the result that we get such statements as "Dane opposed the activities of the Convention [Hartford] only because of his legal mind." Despite its deficiencies, which are chiefly the result of the attempt to do too much, Mrs. Bauer has made available a handy summary of the elaborate rationalizations developed to justify the several views of the nature of the Constitution and the federal union and she has provided a convenient reference to the commentators and their works. She closes with an excellent bibliography.—JACK W. PELTASON, University of Illinois.

Administration and the Nursing Services. By HERMAN FINER. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1952. Pp. xiv, 333. $4.00.)

The study of administration has much to gain from careful analysis of administrative problems in particular professions. Similarly, various professions have much to gain from analysis of their problems in the light of more general administrative analyses. Accordingly, when a distinguished political scientist like Herman Finer works as director of a research project for almost a year, and a seminar of 36 nurses and teachers of nursing work with him for five months on this project, much should be learned by both nurses and students of administration.

A substantial amount is learned in this volume. Finer ranges over the administrative universe, gives many points of administrative theory, and has a number of penetrating remarks about nursing problems for administrators. It is true that the book is wordy and poorly organized. It certainly cannot be viewed as a careful study of the administration of nursing. Nevertheless, it should be useful to thoughtful general administrators and nursing administrators in gleaning some of the scraps of wisdom scattered through the volume.

In his introductory qualifications, the author recognizes clearly that the book is not a comprehensive treatise on nursing administration. It is intended to answer these three questions: (1) "Is the science of administration needed in the conduct of nursing service?" (2) "If so . . . how seriously is it needed?" (3) "... what inferences are to be drawn for the curriculum of schools of nursing and for the spread of a knowledge of administration among nurses already on the job?"

These questions are answered fairly satisfactorily, though one must hunt around to find the answers. One can also query if 320 pages are necessary to answer these questions. It must be admitted, however, that the answer to the third question is very broad. It includes, for example, a list of 36 novels which nurses should read to broaden their understanding of people. The problem of sex relations between doctors and nurses receives a glancing blow. Robinson Crusoe receives three pages of attention, on the theory that he was becoming a good administrator in learning how to govern himself.

All of these things are relevant and suggestive to the reader who knows much about administration. The reviewer has his doubts, however, about the clearness of the "message" to nurses or to ordinary people.—GEORGE C. S. BENSON, Claremont Men's College.

Training for Specialized Mission Personnel.

By WALLACE S. SAYRE AND CLARENCE E. THURBER. (Chicago: Public Administration Service. 1952. Pp. xiii, 85. $1.00.)

This survey, sponsored by the Public Administration Clearing House, is concerned with the initial training of the personnel of specialized missions sent overseas by the United States government under programs developed since World War II. The authors describe and evaluate briefly early and present governmental training programs for this purpose (with brief descriptions also of certain business and religious training programs for overseas personnel) and point out the problems that persist in their development. In addition, there is discussion of the major elements in a comprehensive training plan, the need for a center of leadership within the government to view the specialized mission training problem as a whole, and the relation of universities and their resources to this problem.

The CIO and the Democratic Party. By FAY CALKINS. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press. Pp. xiii, 162. $4.00.)

Five first-hand case studies (Ohio, Steubenville, Chicago, Rockford, Michigan) of CIO-PAC political activities in the elections of 1950, by the Research Assistant of the National CIO-PAC.

Monopoly and Social Control. By HENRY A. WELLS. (Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1952. Pp. ix, 158. $3.25.)

Mr. Wells—in a book which Wendell Berge, in a foreword, extravagantly calls “the most illuminating document written in our time”—elaborates the argument that there is a conflict between democratic social control designed to maintain competition and fatalistic forces making for concentration of economic power; contrasts American empirical methods with Utopian and Marxian approaches; and analyzes the problems in making anti-trust policy effective.

The American Socialist Movement, 1897-1913. By IRA KIPNIS. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1952. Pp. 496. $6.00.)

An intensive and well-documented history and analysis of the American Socialist party from its inception through its period of greatest activity and success.

Report on the American Communist. By MORRIS L. ERNST AND DAVID LOTH. (New York: Henry Holt & Company. 1952. Pp. 240. $3.00.)

A socio-psychological analysis of the motivations inducing persons to join, to remain in, and finally to renounce the Communist party, based on a case study of some 300 former Communists. Some of the authors' conclusions will come as a surprise to the reader, and the work as a whole represents a new approach to the study of the Communist problem in America.

The American Diaries of Richard Cobden. EDITED BY ELIZABETH HOON CAWLEY. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1952. Pp. vii, 233. $4.00.)

Richard Cobden's hitherto unpublished diaries of his trips to the United States in 1835 and 1859, with annotations and a lengthy introduction by the editor.

American Beginnings; Highlights and Side-lights of the Birth of the New World. By JARVIS M. MORSE. (Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1952. Pp. ix, 260. $3.75.)

A survey of selected writings on British-America published before 1775. Each work is summarized together with information as to its author and the historical circumstances under which it was written.

Thomas Mifflin and the Politics of the American Revolution. By KENNETH R. ROSSMAN. (Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press. 1952. Pp. ix, 344. $5.00.)

A first biography of a Revolutionary quartermaster-general, president of the Continental Congress, member of the Federal Convention from Pennsylvania, and governor of Pennsylvania.

Elias Boudinot; Patriot and Statesman, 1740-1821. By GEORGE ADAMS BOYD. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1952. Pp. ix, 321. $5.00.)

A carefully written biography of a president of the Continental Congress, who later served in the first three Congresses under the Constitution and as director of the U. S. Mint.

R. R. Bowker; Militant Liberal. E. McCLUNG FLEMING. (Norman: University of Oklahoma Press. 1952. Pp. xv, 395. $5.00.)

Biography of a many-sided American of the late 19th and early 20th centuries. Bowker, who was long connected with Publishers' Weekly, was also a founder of the American Library Association and the Library Journal, an ardent advocate of “good government,” and an able industrial executive.

McCarthy; The Man, the Senator, the “Ism.” By JACK ANDERSON AND RONALD W. MAY. (Boston: The Beacon Press. 1952. Pp. vi, 431. $3.75.)

A critical journalistic treatment of one of the most controversial political figures of the last decade and of the techniques associated with “McCarthyism.” Based on numerous interviews and available newspaper and personal files.

Politics, Parties, and Pressure Groups. By V. O. KEY, JR. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company. Third Edition. 1952. Pp. xvi, 799. $5.50.)

An extensive revision of a well-established textbook, incorporating more recent research contributions and significant political developments. Two relatively theoretical chapters have been dropped to make way for new materials which generally give greater emphasis to political parties and somewhat less to the data on pressure groups. Much new illustrative material has been added or substituted for that previously used.

A Future for Nashville. By THE COMMUNITY SERVICES COMMISSION FOR DAVIDSON COUNTY AND THE CITY OF NASHVILLE. (Nashville, Tennessee: The Community Services Commission. 1952. Pp. x, 201. $4.00.)

A report with recommendations on the problems of government in Davidson County, Tennessee, in which the capital city of Nashville is located, by an agency authorized in 1951 by the state General Assembly. Recommendations pertain to such matters as city and county home rule, annexation, and allocation of functions between city and county.

America's Greatest Challenge. By WALTER E.

MYER AND CLAY COSS. (Washington: Civic Education Service. 1952. Pp. 215. $2.75.)

An appeal for an intensive campaign for better political education in the United States both in the schools and throughout the nation as a whole.

The Nature of Gambling. By DAVID D. ALLEN. (New York: Coward-McCann. 1952. Pp. 249. $3.50.)

A study of the role and function of gambling in society. Three basic propositions are formulated and examined: whether gambling is a fundamental human activity, whether it is harmful, and whether it can be suppressed.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

A Documentary History of Chinese Communism. BY CONRAD BRANDT, BENJAMIN SCHWARTZ, AND JOHN K. FAIRBANK. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1952. Pp. 552. $7.50.)

For twenty-eight years, as Mao Tse-tung put it, the Chinese Communist party "had to travel a zigzag path" before it could gain its basic victory in 1949. The numerous zigzags along the way are clearly revealed in the forty documents brought together by Messrs. Brandt, Schwartz, and Fairbank. They range from the First Manifesto of the CCP on the Current Situation (June 10, 1922) through the Organic Law of the Central People's Government (September 27, 1949), but cover the period from 1922 through 1945 with much greater intensity than the postwar period. The documents are carefully edited and readably translated; they have been selected with a sound sense of discrimination; and many of them, exhumed from obscure and forgotten sources, are made available for the first time to the English-reading public. On every score, the Documentary History is a notable contribution to our knowledge and understanding of the Chinese Communist mentality. The work is buttressed by a chronology, a bibliography, and a glossary of terms that make it an important tool for future research. The documents are introduced, usually in groups of two or more, by comprehensive and scholarly commentaries that reflect a high quality of scholarship. Standing by themselves, these commentaries contribute notably to the analysis and interpretation of the Communist movement; taken in conjunction with the documents, they form part of a work that for some years to come will be a standard work of reference on the subject.

The author-compilers direct their attention almost exclusively to the evolution of the "party line," resisting the temptation to deal with more detailed matters of administrative routine or with specific substantive policies. The party line rationalizes the relations between the CCP and the CPSU; it reveals changing tactical concepts in relations with the Kuomintang and with the Japanese enemy; it shows how Marxism-Leninism came to be adapted to the special requirements of the revolution in an agrarian China. Essentially, the party line shows how far the Chinese Communists of 1949 had come from the romantic Marxists who founded the party in 1921 under the illusion that their revolution would liberate the Chinese people from the tyrannies of that time. The old tyrannies have, perhaps, been demolished; but new tyrannies have taken their place and the liberation of the Chinese people still remains for the future.—H. ARTHUR STEINER, University of California (Los Angeles).

This timely, comprehensive study provides the most succinct and enlightening discussion of the origin and development of proletarian groups in Japan which has yet come to this reviewer's attention. The volume comprises five sections which are concerned with various stages in the evolution of the Socialist, Communist, and lesser left wing groups in prewar and postwar Japan. Section I describes the proletarian movement in Japan during the interim between the two World Wars, the rise of national socialism in Japan and the consequent repression of left wing groups, and the activities of left wing Japanese leaders in exile in both Communist and Nationalist China. Section II provides an excellent summary of the revival of the Socialist and Communist parties in the immediate postwar period and describes the tremendous growth of the trade union movement (from some 400,000 members in the period prior to 1940 to over 6,500,000 in 1948) during the early years of the occupation. Sections III and IV give a concise account of the programs of the left wing parties, an almost chronological treatment of their activities during the years 1945-1947, and cover the period of the coalition cabinets (Socialists, Democrats, and People's Cooperatives) of premiers Katayama and Ashida. Section V deals with major left wing developments between January, 1949 and June, 1950, including an interesting discussion of the decline of the Communist party, due in large measure to its controversy with the Cominform, to popular indignation over Soviet obstinacy on the repatriation issue, and to Soviet accusations against the Emperor.

Very useful biographical data on Japanese left wing leaders are conveniently summarized in the appendixes together with a roster of the leaders of each of the left wing parties. This study should be of real utility to students of Far Eastern international relations and of the governments of the Far East. Of minor consequence, but requiring remedy in subsequent editions, is the evidence of careless proofreading found on page 59.—DONALD M. CASTLEBERRY, San Francisco State College.

Southeast Asia. By E. H. G. DOBBY. (New York: John Wiley & Sons. 1951. Pp. 415. $5.00.)

Professor Dobby has undertaken the ambitious task of presenting in one volume "a picture of environmental conditions and human adaptations in Southeast Asia." Approximately half of the volume is devoted to a detailed description, some of it in highly technical terminology, of the natural landscape of Southeast Asian countries and island groups. The other half deals with the cultural (economic) and social "landscapes" of the component countries, followed by four concluding chapters on so-called human geography (agriculture, fisheries, industry and trade, peoples and politics). The author presents an enormous mass of useful reference data interlarded with some searching analyses. The book is illustrated by 120 maps and charts of varying importance.

As a pioneering effort in a field covered elsewhere, if at all, only in a fragmentary way the book is a welcome addition to the growing literature on Southeast Asia. It is nevertheless uneven in its coverage of the area and in the quality of its treatment of the various regions. The author, for example, devotes some sixty pages to Malaya, the area he knows best, as compared with twenty-eight to Java-Madoera and twenty-nine to Siam. Dutch reviewers have pointed out the handicap of his unfamiliarity with materials in that language. When he leaves the field of his basic competence, natural geography, and undertakes to generalize on historical aspects or social, economic, and political conditions, annoying errors creep in as well as doubtful generalizations. For example, the author underestimates the adverse effects of the recent war on Burma; he is unaware of the vast potential in rice lands still available for development in the Irrawaddy delta; and he makes the erroneous assertion that Burmese Buddhists hold fishermen in disrepute because they destroy life. Mr. Dobby concludes with a gloomy discussion of the prospects for the future of the emerging national states in terms of "congenial poverty," which lacks both historical perspective and an assessment of dynamic political factors. Mr. Dobby's conclusions, in other words, reflect the dismay of the colonial apologist. Mr. Dobby would probably have made a more solidly useful contribution if he had recognized in larger measure the limitations of the geographical approach to political and social problems.—JOHN F. CADY, Cornell University.

Public Administration in Siam. By W. D. REEVE. (New York: Royal Institute of International Affairs. 1951. Pp. vi, 93. $2.00.)

Mr. Reeve's description of the governmental administrative agencies of Siam is one of a series of such studies sponsored by the Institute of Pacific Relations. The author served for some twenty years as administrative adviser at Bangkok, and his account concerns primarily the central administration of Siam since 1932. Background factors are sketchily presented; provincial administration is treated only superficially; no attempt is made to assess the political awareness of the Siamese villager or his attitude toward the expanding agencies of government. The author makes some penetrating comments concerning such administrative problems as bottlenecks, overstaffing, and favoritism, but he does not discuss political dynamics, the stultifying effects of military interference, and the basic problem of developing a public consciousness to which governmental servants can be held responsible for their actions. The book contributes much to our understanding of governmental problems in Siam, but Mr. Reeve could probably have told us much more if he had not been so concerned to avoid offending Siamese sensibilities. A realistic appraisal of government in Siam has yet to be made.—JOHN F. CADY, Cornell University.

It is a pleasure to acknowledge the excellence of this short but scholarly study of the demographic situation in Malaya, the first effort of its kind for any country of Southeast Asia. The author is a British member of the Malayan Civil Service who studied at Princeton University's Office of Population Research in 1949-50 on a Commonwealth Civil Service Fellowship. He utilizes as principal sources the censuses of 1931 and 1947, exposes them to expert scrutiny, and then stays within the bounds of his dependable information. After an introductory chapter on general trends, he describes in turn the Malaysian, the Chinese and the Indian populations. Concluding chapters analyze the vulnerability of Malaya to the vagaries of the world market for rubber and tin, and estimate the prospects for achieving some kind of a demographic balance in terms of productivity and resources. Much of the author's technical analysis of fertility and mortality statistics will be of more interest to the demographer than to the social scientist, but his conclusions are sharply defined. It is clear from his exposition that Malaya cannot be regarded as an area for future immigration from neighboring areas of population pressure, such as Java, China, and India, without aggravating its economic problems beyond the point of possible solution. Here is one study that will not have to be done again soon.—J.F.C.

L'Europe en face de son Destin. By EDOUARD BONNEFOUS. (Paris: Presses Universitaires de France. 1952. Pp. 386.)

"Pourquoi le cheminement de l'idée européenne a-t-il été si lent?" asks the author, co-editor of L'Année Politique and professor of the Institut des Hautes Etudes Internationales, in the concluding chapter of the volume. And he puts the blame squarely upon the nineteenth century with its nationalism, the new German philosophy which killed humanism, and the German unification under Prussia. For these were, in the author's opinion, the influences which pushed into the background "l'idée européenne" which flourished in the eighteenth century. It is this slow "cheminement" of the "idée européenne" (which comprises, in the author's connotation, European unity) which is the theme of the book. After discussing in the first four chapters the main factors which helped to shape European thought, the historical origins of Europe, and the earlier attempts to unite Europe both prior to and after World War I, the author proceeds to what is the main part of his book: a detailed description and analysis of the Council of Europe, the Schuman Plan, the European Defense Community, and some other cooperative projects in specialized fields. More than one third of the book consists of documents relating to the various postwar projects of European cooperation.—E.T.

Soviet Opposition to Stalin; A Case Study in World War II. By GEORGE FISCHER. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1952. Pp. viii, 230. $4.00.)

The title of this book is somewhat misleading, for only its third part deals with Soviet opposition to Stalin as such, while the first two parts (comprising two-thirds of the book) are devoted to a careful, well-documented, detailed study of General Vlasov's movement from its beginnings until its liquidation and the execution in Moscow of its leaders. A case study of the defection and activities of Vlasov and his associates during World War II does provide a considerable amount of material throwing light on the Soviet opposition to Stalin. Yet much more than that is needed if one embarks upon a general analysis of such a complex phenomenon. Thus the "close interconnection" which the author claims to exist between the first two parts and the third part of the book is not quite as close as it ought to be and the many interesting observations he makes in the last part regarding the "larger problems of Soviet opposition" are only partly based on what can be obtained from a case study of Vlasov's movement. In collecting and correlating materials and documents on this movement Mr. Fischer has certainly made a worthwhile contribution toward a better understanding of what he rightly calls "one of the most dramatic episodes of World War II."—E.T.

Kuomintang and Chinese Communist Elites. By ROBERT C. NORTH WITH THE COLLABORATION OF ITHIEL DE SOLA POOL. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1952. Pp. vii, 130. $1.75.)

This study in the Hoover Institute "elite" series is a suggestive exploration of the motives and attitudes of the leadership cadres within the Kuomintang and the Chinese Communist party. It is the first serious effort to correlate the social origins and experiences of the leadership cadres with the general political lines of their respective parties, bringing statistical methods to bear upon the data compiled from careful biographical studies.—H.A.S.

Democracy At Bay; A Diagnosis and a Prognosis. By FELIX SOMARY. (New York: Alfred A. Knopf. 1952. Pp. xiii, 171. $2.50.)

A brief review of the history of democracy from the late 18th century to 1914, an analysis of the impact of the two World Wars upon the democratic movement, and a statement of the dilemmas of present-day democracy.

British Colonial Constitutions, 1947. By MARTIN WIGHT. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1952. Pp. xxvi, 571. $8.50.)

A valuable collection of constitutional documents from the dependent empire, superseding the prewar collection by the Foreign Office. A number of constitutions are given in complete detail; others are abridged. An excellent 100-page introduction describes the nature and progress of colonial constitutions and offers a valuable classification of them.

Democracy in the Dominions. By ALEXANDER BRADY. (Toronto: The University of Toronto Press. 1952. Pp. viii, 604. $6.50.)

Developments since 1947 are included in this second edition of a useful study of government in Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, and an added final section compares and generalizes on the significance of social, economic and political trends in the four dominions.

Racial Separation in South Africa; An Analysis of Apartheid Theory. By EUGENE P. DVORIN. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1952. Pp. xii, 256. $4.50.)

An objective and timely appraisal of a crucial area of racial and political tension. In the program known as "apartheid," the Nationalist party of South Africa proposes to divide the Union into separate areas for whites and blacks, and by means of this geographic apartness to reinforce social, economic and political barriers, with the white or European "master race" in complete power.

The Pilgrimage and After; The Story of How the Congress Fought and Won the General Elections. EDITED BY DR. N. V. RAJHUMAR FOR THE CENTRAL PUBLICITY BOARD WITH FOREWORD BY GULZARILAL NANDA AND INTRODUCTION BY R. R. DIWAKAR. (New Delhi: All-India Congress Committee. 1952. Pp. vi, 176. Rs. 2/8/-.)

This brief account of how the Congress party fought and won the first elections (1951-52) under the new Constitution of India contains a narrative of the election tour of Jawahrlal Nehru, the Congress president, to all parts of the republic, as well as a summary of the subject matter of some of his principal speeches, an analysis of election results for the national parliament and the state legislative assemblies, and the personnel of the Central and State Congress ministries.—J.B.C.

Administrative Directory of the Government of Pakistan. By THE CABINET SECRETARIAT. (Karachi: Manager of Publications. 1951. Pp. viii, 396. Oblong format. Rs. 4/12/-.)

The directory of the Pakistan government as of November 1, 1951, scheduled to be published once a year, gives in Part I a list of the officers of the various ministries and the departments directly attached to them, and in Part II a list of the subjects dealt with as well as a statement of the distribution of the work among the various branches. Parts III and IV are devoted to the provinces and states, and Part V to the listing of the Pakistan representatives abroad. For the Constituent Assembly only the officers and staff are given, not the members. There is no index to agencies or persons.—J.B.C.

Prohibition Inquiry Report in Bombay State. By SHRI M. D. BHANSALI, I.C.S. (Bombay: Government Central Press. 1952. Pp. iv, 58.)

Total prohibition was introduced in Bombay State on April 6, 1950. A subsequent judgment of the Indian Supreme Court held that the State could not impose a general ban on, but could regulate the possession and use of spirituous toilet or medicinal preparations, thus invalidating some provisions of the Act. The inquiry mentions "the good results which are noticeable in the rural areas and among the poorer classes," but indicates that "except for official effort which is handicapped by finance very little public support is forthcoming, and the enthusiasm which marked the advent of prohibition is found lacking." The report summarizes 39 recommendations looking towards the effective enforcement of total prohibition.—J.B.C.

Bihar, 1946-51; a Brief Review. PUBLISHED BY DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC RELATIONS, BIHAR. (Patna: Government Press. 1951. Pp. xii, 254. Rs. 1-8-0.)

This review of the government of Bihar State in India since the Congress ministry took over in April, 1946, discusses a number of points of interest such as agrarian reforms and the abolition of landlordism, the economic and educational development of backward and suppressed classes, and the adoption of Hindi in Devanagiri script as the official language. At present the Legislative Assembly transacts its business partly in Hindi and partly in English.—J.B.C.

Indicador da organização administrativa federal. (Atualizado até 15 de novembro de 1951.) By DEPARTAMENTO ADMINISTRATIVO DO SERVIÇO PÚBLICO. (Rio de Janeiro: Imprensa Nacional. 1952. Pp. xx, 600.)

The seventh edition of the Brazilian government organization manual as of November 15, 1951, is the first to appear since Getulio Vargas assumed the presidency again at the end of January, 1951. The manual includes all branches of the government, gives the addresses, organization and functions, with citations to constitutional, statutory and other authorization, but does not give the names of the principal officials. Organization charts are included. The volume concludes with a list of the principal current official periodicals.—J.B.C.

El gobierno del Sr. Galo Plaza, presidente constitucional de la república del Ecuador, 1948-1952. Tomo IV and V. (Quito: Talleres gráficos nacionales. 1952. Pp. xli, 739; 526.)

The final volumes of the report on the presidency of Galo Plaza of Ecuador are remarkable in that they reflect an administration which served out the duly elected term until the end of August, 1952. The fourth volume is devoted to "estudios, proyectos e informes técnicos," 1948-1952; and the fifth, designated "Informe del cuarto año de gobierno," includes the farewell address.—J.B.C.

Der Kampf um den Südweststaat. Verhandlungen und Beschlüsse der gesetzgebenden Körperschaften des Bundes und des Bundesverfassungsgerichtes. BY INSTITUT FÜR STAATSLEHRE UND POLITIK, E.V., MAINZ. (München: Isar Verlag. 1952. Pp. 507.)

A collection of the basic documents in the "Southwest Case," preceding the union of Baden, Württemberg-Baden, and Württemberg-Hohenzollern as Baden-Württemberg at the end of April, 1952.—J.B.C.

Staatsanzeiger für Baden-Württemberg. (Stuttgart: Staatsministerium. No. 1-27, April 30-Aug. 16, 1952. 15 DM a year.)

The first three numbers of the official gazette of the new Southwest German state of Baden-Württemberg appeared under the title Staatsanzeiger für das Südwestdeutsche Bundesland. The gazette, which appears twice a week, contains a report of the proceedings of the Verfassungsgebende Landesversammlung, which was elected on March 9th, 1952, and had held four sessions previous to the first number of the gazette. The provisional government or cabinet had been constituted on April 25. In No. 6, of June 4, there is contained a report of the final sessions on May 30 of the Landtag in each of the three states of Baden, Württemberg-Baden, and Württemberg-Hohenzollern, which had united to form Baden-Württemberg.—J.B.C.

Gesetzblatt für Baden-Württemberg. (Stuttgart: Buchdruckerei Chr. Scheufele. No. 1-10, April 28-Sept. 27, 1952. Pp. 1-36. 12 DM a year.)

The first issue of the law gazette of the new Southwest German state formed by the Union of Baden, Württemberg-Baden, and Württemberg-Hohenzollern, had the title Gesetzblatt für das Südwestdeutsche Bundesland. The "Überleitungsgesetz" of May 15 enacted by the Verfassungsgebende Landesversammlung settled upon the name Baden-Württemberg for the state, and with no. 2 of May 17 the title became Gesetzblatt für Baden-Württemberg. A "Bekanntmachung" of July 8th by the provisional government in no. 7 defines the functions of the ministries.—J.B.C.

The West German Federal Government. BY ELMER PLISCHKE WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF H. J. HILLE. (Historical Division, Office of the Executive Secretary, Office of the U. S. High Commissioner for Germany. 1952. Pp. viii, 182.)

General survey of the West German Federal Government from its inception in 1949 to the beginning of 1952. A number of useful charts are appended to the volume.

Berlin: Development of its Government and Administration. BY ELMER PLISCHKE WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF ELISABETH ERDMANN. (Historical Division, Office of the Executive Secretary, Office of the U. S. High Commissioner for Germany. 1952. Pp. xii, 257.)

A study of the government of Berlin with major emphasis on the years 1949-1951 and a brief survey of developments since 1945. Includes an appendix of 20 documents relative to the topic.

Guide des ministères: Revue de l'administration belge, 1952-1953. (Bruxelles: Secrétariat, 37, rue de Pascale. 1952. Pp. 534.)

The second edition of the unofficial directory of the Belgian government is kept up to date by monthly supplements. The volume includes the Royal Palace, the legislative branch, the ministries in alphabetical order, the Conseil d'Etat, the Cour des Comptes, business and other enterprises of the government, provincial and city governments, the ports, political parties, chambers of commerce, etc. There is an index to agencies but not to persons. The official Almanach royal ceased publication with 1939, and the only other similar publication has been the long-continuing Annuaire administratif et judiciaire de Belgique published by Bruylant at Brussels.—J.B.C.

Impressa publica Regni Danici 1951. Bibliografisk fortegnelse over statens tryksager og statsunderstøttede publikationer, tilligemed Fortegnelse over publikationer udgivne eller subventionerede af Københavns og Århus kommuner, 1951. (København: Det Kongelige Bibliotek. 1952. Pp. 92.)

The annual bibliography of Danish official documents which began with the year 1948 has with this volume added the official documents of the two largest cities of Denmark—Copenhagen, and Aarhus. The main part of the volume continues arrangement of the ministries in alphabetical order following Rigsdagen, with indexes to topics and persons.—J.B.C.

East Africa High Commission. Interterritorial cooperation: Work of the East Africa Central Legislative Assembly (Nairobi, Kenya. 1952. Pp. 107.)

The report (Despatch 1/52) to the Colonial Office, London, by Sir Philip Euen Mitchell, the chairman of the High Commission, on the first four years of the High Commission, 1948-1951. The New Central Assembly met first for a further four-year period on January 29, 1952. The rather intricate organization of the executive agencies of the High Commission is explained, together with their relationship to the Central Assembly and to the authorities of the three territories of Kenya, Tanganyika and Uganda. The report includes the membership of the boards, committees and councils of the Assembly as of May, 1952, and a list of the publications of these agencies, 1948-1951.—J.B.C.

Israel. List of Government Publications. COMPILED BY THE STATE ARCHIVES AND LIBRARY. (Jerusalem: Government Printer. 1952 [5712]. Pp. 62. 200 pruta.)

The careful list of the official publications of the government of Israel reveals that there have been a certain number of items issued in languages other than Hebrew. The main title-page and a brief prefatory note are in Hebrew.—J.B.C.

Nigeria. Standing orders of the House of Representatives. (Lagos: Government Printer. 1952. Pp. 40.)

The standing orders for the new legislative body of Nigeria, which began functioning early in 1952, were made by J. S. Macpherson, governor of Nigeria, as of January 9, 1952. The practice of the House of Commons of Great Britain and Northern Ireland is to be followed in case of doubt.—J.B.C.

The Forgotten Republics. BY CLARENCE A. MANNING. (New York: Philosophical Library. 1952. Pp. xii, 264. $2.75.)

A study of Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia, their peoples, culture, and political development from the first century A.D. to their incorporation in the Soviet Union, written by an Associate Professor of Slavic Languages at Columbia University.

Heroic Finland. BY DAVID HINSHAW. (New York: C. P. Putnam's Sons. 1952. Pp. xxii, 306. $4.50.)

In nineteen brief chapters the author, highly sympathetic to Finland, covers in a rather general way varied aspects of Finnish life from politics and reparations to music, sports, forests and lakes.

Contemporary Ethiopia. BY DAVID ABNER TALBOT. (New York: Philosophical Library. 1952. Pp. x, 267. $4.50.)

The American editor of the government-owned Ethiopian Herald describes modern Ethiopia and its progress since Haile Selassie first assumed office in 1916.

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy; Volume II, 1925-1932. SELECTED AND EDITED BY JANE DEGRAS. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1952. Pp. xxi, 560. $9.00.)

The editor of this collection of documents, Volume I of which was noted in the September, 1951 issue of this REVIEW, continues in Volume II to bring closer to the present the documentary story of Soviet foreign policy. The list of documents from which the editor has made her selection is to be found in her previous publication, Calendar of Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy (London: Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1948). This second volume commences with an extract of a speech by Stalin at the Central Committee of the Russian Communist party made on January 19, 1925 and ends with a Tass statement on Soviet-Japanese negotiations for a non-aggression pact released on January 17, 1933. It is particularly valuable as regards Soviet material on Russian policy in the Far East during this period, for many of the documents are concerned with questions of Soviet relations with China, Manchuria, Japan, and other Far Eastern areas. Very significant statements of Stalin made during this period are given; among them is the statement of March 22, 1925 on the task of Communist parties, which is well worth reading to understand contemporary Soviet policy. Stalin defines the task of Communist parties as (1) the exploitation of contradictions within the capitalist countries, (2) the joining of the working class of leading countries with the national revolutionary movement in backward areas against imperialism, (3) the capturing of the trade union movements, (4) the bringing of the working class into touch with the small peasants, and (5) the supporting of the Soviet Union.

The reviewer believes that the editor of these documents has rendered to those students who do not read Russian a great service in presenting the source material on Soviet foreign policy as it developed in the period between 1925 and 1933, a period which, carefully studied, will lend considerable insight on the trends of Soviet policy more than twenty years later.—WILLIAM B. BALLIS, University of Washington.

Make the UN Effective For Peace. BY JOHN BAUER. (New York: Richard R. Smith. 1952. Pp. 160. $2.50.)

This small book advocates total disarmament and prohibition of aggression to be enforced by a reformed United Nations supplied with inspection staff and military forces. The author seems to think of the execution of his plan as merely administrative, the carrying out of provisions of the treaty which will state policy; but only fragmentary proposals are made concerning matters to be regulated in the treaty. As a result the author never comes to grips with the many real problems inherent in his proposal. There is nothing of value in the rather odd proposals for reconstituting the General Assembly and the Security Council. That the author is aware of difficulties in the way of adoption of his scheme is shown in the chapter on "possible objections." The preface indicates that the author is a "layman," following international relations as an avocation, his field of professional competence being that of economist in the field of public utility regulation. The book has no notes, bibliography or index.—CHESNEY HILL, University of Missouri.

Unconditional Surrender; The Roots of a World War III. By F. O. MIKSCHÉ. (London: Faber & Faber, Ltd. 1952. Pp. 468. Cloth 25s.)

Colonel Miksche, former Czecho-Slovak military attaché in Paris, undertakes in this "desperate appeal to common sense," as he calls it, to demolish a number of historical assumptions without which Allied policy in World Wars I and II cannot be fitted into a rational pattern of behavior. Not only that: Colonel Miksche advances with great cogency a historical argument which, if accepted, is conclusive evidence of the complete irrationality of our previous foreign policy. For this reason reviewers, according to their Gemütsregungen, will be tempted to praise or damn the book in terms hardly appropriate for scientific periodicals.

The author gives an excellent résumé of the history of Russian Pan-Slav imperialism, beginning with the supposed Testament of Peter the Great and ending with the prophetic remark of Colonel House in December, 1917: "I thought we had to take into consideration the Russia of fifty years from now rather than the Russia of today. While we might hope it would continue democratic and cease to be aggressive, yet if the contrary happened, Russia would be a menace to Europe and not Germany. I asked him [Balfour] not to look upon Germany as a permanent enemy. If we did this, it would confuse our reasoning and mistakes would be likely to be made." Miksche believes that the net result of World Wars I and II was to remove successively the two Central European bastions against Russian expansionism, Austria-Hungary and Germany. The balkanization of the Danube countries after World War I intensified rather than appeased the national and cultural tensions in the area and created a situation inviting hegemony by a great power—either Germany or Soviet Russia.

Colonel Miksche goes at length into the question of supposed German "aggressiveness." "Germany," said Lord Salisbury in 1880, "is clearly cut out to be our ally." Bismarck echoed the idea: "It would be madness for us to quarrel with England." The story of subsequent events, particularly the gradual deterioration of German-British relations from 1900 to 1914 is, as Colonel Miksche tells it, a story of almost cosmic stupidity on both sides.

In his chapter entitled "Whose Fault Was Hitler?" Colonel Miksche shows how Allied refusal to revise the war-guilt clause in the Versailles Treaty served as a major cause of Hitlerism. "Germany was condemned to disgrace as a criminal nation, and it was that fact that gave the Germans courage in their unequal and disastrous struggle." He agrees that National Socialism was a political disease, requiring a radical operation, but insists that the United States, and to a lesser extent the British, forgetting the long-term problem of Pan-Slav imperialism, set out not to cut out the cancer but to kill the patient.

The author finds only one possible objective for present foreign policy: to pick up the remaining pieces of Europe and put them together as effectively as possible. After a detailed analysis of Soviet and Western military and economic potential, with convincing statistical support, Colonel Miksche concludes that the defense of Europe requires as principal conditions: (1) rehabilitation of Germany and the formation of a German army, (2) the political stabilization of France and (3) the inclusion of Spain in a general plan of European defense. The book concludes with an informative chapter on Communist psychological tactics and the organization of the Cominform, and a futuristic "horror story" of a Soviet invasion of a Western Europe whose members are still arguing about whether German troops should be permitted and Spain accepted as an ally.—KURT GLASER, Governmental Affairs Institute.

Principles of International Law. By HANS Kelsen. (New York: Rinehart & Co. 1952. Pp. xvii, 461. $5.00.)

A new departure in the field of international law texts. Eschewing what he calls the "political" approach to international law, the author relies upon juristic analysis, and the subject is treated from the point of view of his pure theory of law. Hence, for example, the law of war is viewed as a problem in "sanctions" for the punishment of illegal action. Stress is also laid on the integration of the law of the United Nations into the general framework of international law.

Meeting of Minds; A Way to Peace through Mediation. By ELMORE JACKSON. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Co. 1952. Pp. xxii, 200. $3.50.)

Set forth the results of a group effort to determine whether the United Nations may profit from the experience in labor mediation. Included are chapters on mediation in Sweden and settlement of labor disputes in Great Britain by Carl Christian Schmidt and Sir Frederick W. Leggett, respectively, and an appendix on the handling of industrial disputes in the USSR by Lois Jane Stone. Other chapters deal with the settlement of labor disputes in the United States and the problem of mediation of international disputes.

The United States in World Affairs, 1951. By RICHARD P. STEBBINS. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1952. Pp. xiv, 473. $5.00.)

This annual volume surveys the global development of U. S. problems and policies in 1951, while skillfully filling in the background and providing serious thought for the future in a final chapter entitled "The Revolt of the Underprivileged."

Major Problems of United States Foreign Policy, 1952-1953. By THE STAFF OF THE INTERNATIONAL STUDIES GROUP OF THE BROOKINGS INSTITUTION. (Washington: The Brookings Institution. 1952. Pp. xiv, 412. Cloth $4.00, paper $2.00.)

Brookings' sixth annual review of U. S. foreign relations and of current problems facing the policy makers. An extended "problem paper" on raw materials and national policy forms a timely third section of the volume.

The League of Nations Movement in Great Britain, 1914-1919. By HENRY R. WINKLER. (New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press. 1952. Pp. xiii, 288. $3.00.)

An analysis of the several proposals for an international organization offered in Britain during the first World War and an assessment of the movement as a whole in that country.

Atlantic Alliance. NATO's Role in the Free World. A REPORT BY A STUDY GROUP OF THE ROYAL INSTITUTE OF INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS. (London and New York: Royal Institute of International Affairs. 1952. Pp. ix, 172. $1.25.)

Summary of the evolution of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and provocative speculation concerning its future, emphasizing the priority thus far given military preparation and the preference shown for functional cooperation between independent governments rather than federal experiment.

The Sudan Question. By MEKKI ABBAS. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1952. Pp. xix, 201. $4.25.)

A Sudanese—who has been teacher, political leader, editor, special Rhodes scholar, and is now head of a large-scale irrigation project in the Sudan—reviews the history of Anglo-Egyptian controversy over his country since 1883, the increasing importance of the Sudanese viewpoint in this controversy, and the difficulty of finding a settlement acceptable not only to Britain and Egypt but to various factions in the Sudan.

The Iranian Case, 1946. By RICHARD W. VAN WAGENEN. (New York: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. 1952. Pp. 119. $0.50.)

An examination of the United Nations' handling of Iran's complaint against the Soviet Union for failure to evacuate its forces at the end of the war. The author concludes that UN action was significantly but not solely responsible for Russia's withdrawal, that valuable procedural precedents were established, and that this open challenge to Russian moves drove one more minor wedge between East and West. The second in Carnegie's "United Nations Action" series.

The Arab Refugee Problem. By JOSEPH B. SCHACHTMAN. (New York: Philosophical Library. 1952. Pp. xi, 137. $3.00.)

A brief report on the origins, location and needs of the 750,000 Arab refugees who fled or were driven from Palestine, and on the protracted political negotiations deadlocked by Arab government demands for repatriation and Israel's insistence that resettlement in Arab lands is the only solution.

Verdict In Korea. By ROBERT T. OLIVER. (State College, Pa.: Bald Eagle Press. 1952. Pp. 207. $4.00.)

A prolific writer on Korea, and a first-hand sympathetic observer of its people, describes war, politics (domestic and international), and economic problems against a very human Korean background.

Report on Austria, 1951. BY OFFICE OF THE U. S. HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR AUSTRIA. (Vienna. 1952. Pp. 135.)

The section on "quadrupartite affairs" shows particularly the part that the Soviet element has played in the Allied Council discussions by the government of Austria. Also included is a statistical report on displaced persons and refugees in Austria, a chronology for 1951, and a select bibliography on Austria. Especial interest would seem to attach to the volume since the period covers the election and induction into office of the new president.—J.B.C.

The Devil's Chemists. BY JOSIAH E. DUBOIS, JR. IN COLLABORATION WITH EDWARD JOHNSON. (Boston: The Beacon Press. 1952. Pp. x, 374. $3.75.)

An account of the ubiquitous role of I. G. Farbenindustrie in arming and supporting the Nazi government, somewhat dramatically examined by the unsuccessful prosecutor of the I. G. Farben case during the Nuremberg trials.

Crime Without Punishment; The Secret Soviet Terror Against America. BY GUENTHER REINHARDT. (New York: Hermitage House. 1952. Pp. 322. $3.50.)

A German-born former special employee of the FBI and control investigator of the U. S. Counter Intelligence Corps describes a series of murders and other crimes perpetrated by Soviet agents in America and elsewhere.

I documenti diplomatici italiani. BY COMMISSIONE PER LA PUBBLICAZIONE DEI DOCUMENTI DIPLOMATICI OF THE MINISTERO DEGLI AFFARI ESTERI. (Roma: Libreria dello stato. 1952. Prima serie, vol. 1: pp. xlv, 603; ottava serie, vol. 12: pp. lviii, 694.)

The Commission, which is editing the great series of Italian diplomatic documents, was set up by ministerial decree of September 20, 1946, and is at present headed by Alessandro Casati, senator of the Republic. The plan is an objective historical one, based upon the historical archives of the Italian Foreign Office. Even with very careful selection, the whole work is envisioned as extending eventually to about 100 volumes, arranged in nine series from the first covering the period Jan. 8, 1861–Sept. 20, 1870, to the ninth, for the period

Sept. 4, 1939–Sept. 8, 1943. The above seem to be the first two volumes to appear.—J.B.C.

Tratados públicos y acuerdos internacionales de Venezuela. Vol. I–III. 2ª edición. BY MINISTERIO DE RELACIONES EXTERIORES. (Caracas. 1950–51.)

Having gone out of print, the first three volumes of the seven volume treaty collection of Venezuela published from 1924 through 1945 have been reprinted, thus making the whole set still available. The arrangement is chronological, and volumes one to three cover the period 1820–1925. Spanish text only is given. Information is given as to treaties that have been denounced or replaced.—J.B.C.

Brazil; An Interim Assessment. BY J. A. CAMACHO. (New York: Royal Institute of International Affairs. 1952. Pp. xiii, 116. $2.50.)

The maximum amount of helpful and interesting information—geographic, demographic, economic, historical, and political—which can be compressed in such limited space.

Traité instituant la Communauté européenne de défense et Documents annexes. (Paris: La Documentation Française. 1952. Pp. 78. Fr. 350.)

The text of the Treaty setting up the European Defense Community with accompanying documents, published in the unnumbered series Recueils et monographies. There had been two earlier prints of the treaty for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.—J.B.C.

Readings in World Politics. Vol. I, II, and III. REVISED BY ROBERT A. GOLDWIN. (Chicago: American Foundation for Political Education. 1952. Pp. 670.)

Readings in American Foreign Policy. Vol. I, II, and III. REVISED BY ROBERT A. GOLDWIN. (Chicago: American Foundation for Political Education. 1952. Pp. 753.)

Widely-ranging and often provocative collection of readings, printed without comment, prepared as a basis for adult discussion programs sponsored by the publisher. Because the materials were chosen for their suitability as a stimulus to discussion and can be properly utilized only with concurrent discussion under competent leadership, the volumes are only available to persons participating in the Foundation's programs.

POLITICAL THEORY, RESEARCH, AND METHODOLOGY

Geschichtswissenschaft. By FRITZ WAGNER. (Freiburg and Munich: Verlag Karl Alber. 1951. Pp. viii, 468. DM 18.)

The present volume is the first in a series entitled "Orbis Academicus," a major publishing enterprise under the general editorship of Fritz Wagner and Richard Brodführer. German science as an institution has suffered a serious break of continuity through the National Socialist interference with academic organization and personnel. The "Orbis Academicus," in each of its volumes, surveys the "history of problems" of one of the sciences, in order to take stock of the present state and to show the development leading up to it. It will be an indispensable means of orientation for the younger generation of German scholars who suffer from "loss of memory" through the interruption; but it also will be a valuable aid to every scholar in search of information on the development and state of problems in his science.

The volume on Geschichtswissenschaft is edited by Fritz Wagner, Professor of Modern History at the University of Marburg. It assembles the sources concerning the principles of a "science of history" from antiquity to the present. The editor does not too well define in his otherwise excellent introductory notes what he means by "science of history," but the actual selections as well as the incidental comments show that negatively he wants to narrow his task to "critical" history, thus excluding uncritical, annalistic historiography and the constructions of a philosophy of history. Positively he sees the "critical" trend running toward a penetration of historical materials by the principles of a philosophical anthropology. This delimitation of his task determines the proportions of the work. The selections from classic and medieval authors, from the Renaissance, the Enlightenment and the Romantic periods fill about one half of the text; the other half is devoted to the period from Savigny's historical school to the first World War. In the second part the heaviest accents fall on "Germany's Classic Contribution," with ample selections from Ranke and Droysen, and on "Historism," with equally generous selections from Dilthey, York-Wartenburg, Troeltsch and Max Weber. Between these two pillars are placed the positivistic and Marxist sources, and a section on the "Struggle for the Concept of Culture" containing, among others, very interesting passages from such American historians as Marsh, Parker and McMaster.

There is not much sense in quarreling with the editor about this or that detail of his preferences. Where the limitations of the enterprise lie the reader will easily discover when he compares the Greek section in Wagner's volume with Toynbee's "Greek Historical Thought." The work as it stands is an important source book on principles of critical history, without a rival. The American reader will find it most useful as a convenient manual, practically complete, of the German contributions to the problem from Ranke to the present. The value of the book is materially enhanced by a voluminous critical bibliography (pp. 391-438) and an equally careful biographical dictionary (pp. 439-463).—ERIC VOEGELIN, Louisiana State University.

That Grand Whig, Milton. By GEORGE F. SENSABAUGH. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1952. Pp. ix, 222. $4.00.)

John Milton has sometimes been ranked with such contemporaries of his as Thomas Hobbes, James Harrington, John Lilburne, and Sir Robert Filmer. But it has long been suspected that his position as a political theorist rests upon his unquestioned reputation as a literary genius. In fact, the author of the present study accepts the well-known view that the poet's role in the Puritan Rebellion was minor and unimportant.

"What is not known is how, . . . during . . . the period from the Restoration . . . to . . . Queen Anne, his opinions gained ground and silently won for him many disciples, some of whom stood high in Whig councils." Mr. Sensabaugh continues that "this study therefore purposes to trace the impact of Milton's arguments in the battle of ideas which led to the acceptance of the [Revolutionary] Settlement and the Bill of Rights." He takes the title of his book from the fact that before the Whigs adopted Milton, Tories already called him "that grand Whig, Milton." He feels that he earned the right to the title long before John Locke justified the Glorious Revolution. Well could Milton be cited at the time, since he had blended ideas derived from the English common law, Scripture, the law of nature, and the classical Greek and Roman republics.

The author has exhaustively examined sermons, newspapers, broadsides, and editions of Milton's prose tracts to support his thesis. In that process he has made a significant contribution to our knowledge of an important period in Western political thought.

When the author speaks, however, of Milton's revolutionary program as being connected with the basic pattern of seventeenth-century conflict, there is question as to whether this struggle was quite as simple as Mr. Sensabaugh seems to make it. The Civil War involved more than the questions of "liberty of conscience and the power of Kings." As Professor McIlwain has shown, it was no "clear-cut issue between despotism and freedom. Men on the one side looked to the ancient legal rights endangered by a king who could invade them with impunity; men on the other resisted every tendency to impose on a king checks which had never been imposed before." An awareness of this generally accepted interpretation would have made more meaningful the discussion of the use of Bracton in this period. Furthermore, it is an oversimplification to link without qualification the Roman jurists with Filmer and James I. And it is wrong to claim that the achievement of toleration rested upon the "medieval separation of Church and State."—GUY HOWARD DODGE, Brown University.

Introduction to Political Philosophy. BY WILLIAM EBENSTEIN. (New York: Rinehart & Co., Inc. 1952. Pp. xi, 330. $4.00.)

Basically a re-issue of the author's earlier work, Great Political Thinkers, omitting the selections from original sources and retaining and linking together the introductory essays. The coverage extends from Plato to Freud. The bibliography of some sixty pages is of considerable value.

Moral Principles of Action. PLANNED AND EDITED BY RUTH NANDA ANSHEN. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1952. Pp. xii, 720. $7.50.)

A collection of essays by distinguished and contemporary scholars including M. C. D'Arcy, Werner Jaeger, Robert MacIver, Jacques Maritain, and F. S. C. Northrop on the problems of ethics and value and their relation to contemporary social and political problems. Volume VI in the Science of Culture Series.

The Two Sovereignities; A Study of the Relationship between Church and State. BY JOSEPH LECLER. (New York: Philosophical Library. 1952. Pp. x, 186. $3.75.)

In this book Fr. Joseph Lecler, S.J., Professor at the Institut Catholique in Paris and editor of Etudes deals with the problem of the relationship between church and state from the time of the Romans to the present. The analysis and conclusions are presented from the Roman Catholic point of view and represent a balanced and authoritative statement of that position.

The Islamic State and Other Political Essays. BY AJIT KUMAR SEN. (Calcutta: Thacker Spink. 1950. Pp. ii, 141.)

A series of essays on Islamic and Hindu political thought, the government of Pakistan, and the relation of psychology, individualism, religion and science to modern political thought, by a member of the faculty of Calcutta University.

John Locke; The Second Treatise of Government. EDITED BY THOMAS P. PEARDON. (New York: The Liberal Arts Press. 1952. Pp. xviii, 139. $0.75.)

A paper-back reprinting of the text of the 6th edition of Locke's Second Treatise (1764) with modern spelling, annotations, an introduction and a bibliography.

Bentham's Handbook of Political Fallacies. EDITED BY HAROLD A. LARRABEE. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press. 1952. Pp. xxxii, 269. $4.75.)

A revised and edited edition of Bentham's The Book of Fallacies, originally published in London in 1824, with a preface by the editor. Bentham's meanings are preserved, but his English is simplified.

Theory of Legislation; An Essay on the Dynamics of Public Mind. BY E. JORDAN. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1952. Pp. 486. $7.00.)

The reprinting with a new preface of a philosophical treatise on legislation which was originally published in 1930 by the Progress Publishing Company, Indianapolis.

Die Geburtsstunde des souveränen Staates. BY FRIEDRICH AUGUST FREIHERR VON DER HEYDTE. (Regensburg, Germany: Josef Habel. 1952. Pp. viii, 475.)

The author examines carefully and thoroughly political and legal theories of 1250-1350 and comes to the conclusion that that was the period in which foundations were laid for the modern sovereign state and modern international law.

The Structure of Society. BY MARION J. LEVY, JR. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1952. Pp. xvii, 584. $5.00.)

A technical and detailed conceptual scheme and theoretical system for the comparative analysis of societies, termed by the author a "structural-functional analysis."

NEWS AND NOTES

PROFESSIONAL CONFERENCES

The Southern Political Science Association held its twenty-first annual meeting at the Hermitage Hotel in Nashville, Tennessee, November 6-8, 1952. Approximately 150 political scientists from southern colleges and universities attended the sessions.

Topics of the two opening panels were "Responsible Parties Abroad" and "Problems in State Government." Papers on Latin America, Asia, Germany, and Great Britain were read at the first panel. Federalism, interstate relations, the item veto, and state grants to local government were discussed at the second session. Activities of the first day were capped by the presidential address on "The Supreme Court, States' Rights, and Political Freedom in the South," delivered by Professor George Spicer of the University of Virginia.

Subjects considered during the second day included: "Recent Problems of International Law and Relations," "The Case Approach to Public Administration," "The Conflict of Liberty and Authority," and "Party Organization in the South: The Effects of the Campaigns of 1952." Under the latter topic, papers were presented on Louisiana, South Carolina, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, and North Carolina. At the luncheon on the second day, Senator Estes Kefauver spoke on the subject, "An Analysis of the Election Result." Other topics discussed during the meeting were "Cooperative Research and Education in the South" and "States' Rights."

Newly elected officers of the Association are: Charles B. Robson, University of North Carolina, president; Donald R. Larson, University of Miami, vice-president; Mavis A. Mann, West Virginia University, recording secretary; and Manning J. Dauer, University of Florida, secretary-treasurer and managing editor of the Journal of Politics. René de Visme Williamson, of the University of Tennessee, will continue as editor of the Journal of Politics.

A Regional Conference on Universities and World Affairs, sponsored by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and the Council of World Affairs, was held at Cleveland, Ohio, November 20-21, 1952. Topics on the program included: "The Carnegie Endowment Program in Higher Education," "Interchange of Students and Specialists," "The Impact of World Affairs on Instruction in the Social Sciences," "Undergraduate Courses in International Relations," "The Training of Specialists in International Relations," "Training of Personnel for Technical and Social Assistance," "Extra-Curricular Programs as a Part of Education in International Relations," and "Off-Campus Services in Adult Education."

The University of Southern California, in cooperation with the colleges and universities of the Pacific Area, sponsored the twenty-ninth Institute of World Affairs, held December 14-17, 1952, at the Mission Inn, Riverside, California. Charles E. Martin, professor of international law and political science, University of Washington, served as director of the Institute. The general theme of the meeting was "New Weapons for a New Diplomacy, United States Foreign Policy and Its Implementation." University of Southern California professors who participated included: Tracy E. Strevey, Ross N. Berkes, Carl Q. Christol, J. Eugene Harley, Donald W. Rowland, Richard W. Van Alstyne, Clifford A. L. Rich, Robert W. Oliver, David T. Cattell, John W. Reith, Wilbert L. Hindman, Arthur Carstens, Lawrence G. Guild, Theodore H. E. Chen, Bruce Adkinson, Totton J. Anderson, Russell L. Caldwell, Paul E. Hadley, and Norman R. Fertig. R. B. von Kleinsmid served as chancellor for the Institute.

An Institute on Military Factors in Foreign Policy was held at the Center for Continuation Study at the University of Minnesota, September 29-October 1, 1952. Major discussion topics included "Influence of Science and Technology on Military Factors," "Government Machinery for the Formulation and Administration of Foreign Policy," "Military Factors in Foreign Policy—The Elements of Power," and "Military Factors in Foreign Policy—Regional Considerations." Political scientists participating on the five panels were Lloyd M. Short, Charles H. McLaughlin, Benjamin Lippincott, Werner Levi, Dorothy Dodge and William C. Rogers—all of the University of Minnesota. Professors Royden Dangerfield of the University of Illinois, Dorothy Jacobson of Macalester College, and Heinrich Rommen of St. Thomas College served as visiting participants. Professor William C. Rogers, Director of the Minnesota World Affairs Center, was in charge of the Institute. Copies of the proceedings may be secured from Professor Rogers.

The Third Annual Conference on the Caribbean was held at the University of Florida, December 18-20, 1952, under the sponsorship of the School of Inter-American Studies, University of Florida, in cooperation with the Alcoa Steamship Company. During the three-day conference, five round tables were presented covering economic, social, literary and artistic, political and diplomatic, and peace and security trends in the Caribbean area. The panel of speakers included representatives from various American universities, U. S. government agencies, inter-American organizations, and professors and government officials from Mexico, Panama, Honduras, Colombia, and the British West Indies.

The American University, in cooperation with the American Political Science Association, will hold the Annual Institute for Teachers of Government and Administration at The American University, Washington, D. C., June 8-19, 1953. The Institute is designed to give college and university teaching faculty an opportunity to meet with leaders of official Washington and to participate in discussion of current political processes and developments with operating officials. The process of policy formation and decision making is emphasized. The teachers will be introduced to source materials for instruction and research which may not be available or cited in standard reference sources. The program is developed by a planning committee of political scientists with an understanding both of the needs of university teaching and of the facilities of the Nation's Capital. Inquiries concerning the Institute should be addressed to Lowell H. Hattery, The American University, 1901 F Street, N.W., Washington, D. C.

"Responsibility and Action in Housing Development" was the subject of the Fifth Annual Institute on Problems of Government held at the University of Rhode Island on November 20, 1952. Following the keynote address, delivered by Coleman Woodbury, Norton Professor of Regional Planning at Harvard University, questions of housing, zoning and taxation, and assessment of property were covered in a full day of panel discussions led by specialists in these fields. Although the Institute was open to the public, it was organized particularly for state and town officials, architects, constructors and real estate people. Extensive, new home-building developments and consideration of new zoning ordinances in many Rhode Island towns have made the subject of the Institute one of outstanding current interest in the State.

The Ninth International Congress of Administrative Sciences, convened by the International Institute of Administrative Sciences, will be held in Istanbul, Turkey, September 2-10, 1953. The Institute's Scientific Committee and Committee on Administrative Practices will sponsor round-table discussions on topics such as international administrative jurisdiction, international administrative tribunals, grants-in-aid as techniques of administrative direction, the administration of economic development programs, standards of personal performance in government, organization and management problems, and case studies in the conduct of technical assistance programs. Detailed information may be obtained from Edwin Haelele, secretary of the U. S. Section of the Institute, 1313 East 60th Street, Chicago 37.

The International Union of Local Authorities will hold its Eleventh Congress in Vienna, Austria, June 15-20, 1953. The main themes of the Congress will be: "The Large City and the Small Town: Their Strength and Their Weakness" and "Municipal Finance." Persons interested in attending may obtain details from Herbert Emmerich, chairman, U. S. Committee for International Municipal Cooperation, 1313 East 60th Street, Chicago 37.

A meeting on the teaching of the social sciences was held at Unesco House, Paris, September 16-19, 1952. The meeting grew out of an inquiry conducted by the International Social Science Associations for the main disciplines of the social sciences. A report on the round-table conference held in April, 1952, in Cambridge, England, was published in the June, 1952 issue of this REVIEW. The Unesco House meeting was attended by twenty experts of the different disciplines from eleven countries. Representing political science were the president of IPSA, Professor W. A. Robson; one of its three vice-presidents, Professor Maurice Duverger (University of Bordeaux, France); Professor Taylor Cole (Duke University); Professor T. Cavalcanti, president of the Brazilian Institute of Public Law and Political Science; and M. Jean Meynaud, secretary-general of IPSA. Professor M. Ginsberg (The London School of Economics and Political Science) was elected chairman, and M. Meynaud rapporteur.

For part of the sessions, discussion was carried on in three sub-committees: one on the status of the social sciences in universities (Professor Duverger, chairman); one on the role of the social sciences in general education and as a preparation for particular professions (Professor Robson, chairman); and one on the training and recruitment of professors and methods of teaching (Professor J. N. Hazard, Columbia University, chairman). Plenary sessions discussed the reports submitted by each of the sub-committees and reached a certain number of conclusions aiming at the development and improvement of social science teaching.

UNESCO is to publish in 1953 a volume containing the overall reports set up under the responsibility of the International Associations (especially Professor Robson's report). Pamphlets on the teaching of social sciences within three of the surveyed countries (United States, France, and Great Britain) will also be published. The material gathered during this inquiry and the conclusions reached will be valuable, particularly for countries in which social science teaching has not yet been developed extensively.—J. MEYNAUD.

ANNUAL MEETING OF AMERICAN COUNCIL OF LEARNED SOCIETIES

The thirty-sixth annual meeting of the American Council of Learned Societies met at Rye, New York, on January 20-23, 1953. All of the twenty-four constituent societies were represented by delegates, one from each society. Prior to this meeting, the annual conference of secretaries of the constituent societies was held; the secretaries also attended the sessions of the Council. Edward H. Litchfield represented the American Political Science Association as executive director and Kenneth Colegrove as delegate. Unlike usual annual meetings of the ACLS, no representatives of the foundations were present.

Cornelius Krusé, professor of philosophy of Wesleyan University, retired as chairman of the ACLS after service of five years in this post. President C. W. de Kiewiet, of the University of Rochester, was elected as his successor. On September 1, 1952, Dr. Charles E. Odegard, the executive-director, resigned. A veteran staff member, Mortimer Graves, has served as acting executive-director. The Board of Directors is now engaged in selecting a permanent executive-director.

During 1952, the Council received from various sources a total of $981,421.26. Of this amount, it disbursed $644,581.87. The treasurer's report will be published in the Bulletin: American Council of Learned Societies for March, 1953. A summary of the wide activities of the ACLS for the year 1952 follows in somewhat abbreviated form.

Standing Enterprises and Operations. Of the standing enterprises of the ACLS, no progress can be reported on the Linguistic Atlas of the United States and Canada, although the search for funds for its continuation has been maintained. As to the Dictionary of American Biography, there is hope that publication of the supplementary volumes may be resumed. The first supplementary volume, published in 1944, brought the Dictionary down to December 31, 1935.

The Council's long continued interest in the study of Asia resulted in the production in the middle of 1951 of A Program for the Improvement of American Understanding of Asian Civilizations, comprising eight memoranda covering eight points in such a program. This was presented to the Ford Foundation, which organized its own program of fellowships in the amount of $500,000 in 1952; it has just announced a similar program for the current year. For basic implementation of the study of Asian languages, including elementary texts, graded readings, and students' dictionaries, the Ford Foundation has made available to the ACLS the sum of $250,000 over a three-year period beginning in 1952. The operation is now under way. Discussion with the Ford Foundation respecting the later elements of the eight-point program is proceeding, and there is every expectation that some of these will be actualized in the future.

The ACLS Committee on the Language Program continues the work begun under the various ACLS-U. S. Army language programs during World War II. Its most significant operations are: (1) a program producing for the U. S. Department of State elementary textbooks for teaching English to speakers of eleven Asian and East European languages; (2) the new program in Asian language materials for Americans mentioned above; and (3) summer-study aids in linguistics.

The Committee on American Civilization was responsible for the organization of a series of Conferences on "Changes in Systems of Belief in the United States since World War I." The Committee on the History of Religions sponsored Professor Louis Massignon, of the Collège de France, in a series of lectures on Islamic Mysticism. It continued its editing of readers in the world's religious literatures. The first of these, Buddhism: A Religion of Infinite Compassion, was published early in 1952. The Committee on the Humanistic Aspects of Science carried on its work of preparing an annotated bibliography. The Committee on Musicology evaluated its Conference on Music in American Life.

The ACLS, in cooperation with the American Council on Education, the National Research Council, and the Social Science Research Council, continued to be represented on the Committee on International Exchange of Persons, the principal function of which is to advise concerning the selection of professors, lecturers, and research scholars for appointments under the Fulbright program. The Joint Committee on the Recovery of Archaeological Remains extended its activities beyond the borders of the United States by advising the Technical Co-operation Administration on establishing archaeological salvage programs in foreign countries under the Point Four Program. The two regional interests of the ACLS, the Southern Humanities Conference and the Pacific Coast Committee for the Humanities, continue to be restricted by lack of funds.

Fellowships. During 1952, the following awards were administered by the ACLS: 15 first-year graduate fellowships, 25 advanced graduate fellowships, 18 faculty study fellowships, 19 ACLS scholars' grants, and 45 summer study aids in linguistics. Lists of these awards have appeared in the ACLS Newsletter. The need to assist graduate students and faculty members in the fields of the humanities is much greater than the programs of aid available. Indeed, the ACLS, through lack of funds, will apparently not be able to operate any fellowship programs for 1953-1954, except the summer study aids in linguistics.

Personnel Studies Program. The ACLS Personnel Studies program has been largely occupied during the past year in completing the collection phase of the National Registration in the Humanities and the Social Sciences. Altogether, some 27,000 schedules were received from 55,800 individuals queried. Altogether, twenty-three different societies, sixteen of them constituents of the ACLS, cooperated in the program. Fifteen separate classification checklists were devised. There were some complaints about the program, the more general ones concerning themselves with the use of humanistic scholars in connection with militaristic programs. The staff adviser attempted a formalized answer to objections of this kind which was embodied in an article entitled "Cast Out the Beam Out of Thine Own Eye," published in the May issue of the ACLS Newsletter.

Plans for the analysis of registration materials are going forward. The U. S. Bureau of Labor Statistics expects to produce a general statement with as much detail on separate fields as their numbers and importance in the view of government agencies seem to warrant. Additional analyses will be arranged if necessary by the ACLS, and in some cases cooperating societies are actively concerned. In addition to the basic analytical program, registration materials are being used experimentally for purposes of locating scholars with specific combinations of skills and experience. It is hoped that such use can be regularized and made more widely available.

Beyond these activities, a staff adviser has worked with the National Scientific Register, the National Science Foundation, the National Research Council, the Defense Manpower Administration, the Committee on Relationships with the Federal Government of the American Council on Education, and the United States Employment Service of the U. S. Department of Labor.

Publications. The ACLS has continued to explore the means for cheaper methods of manufacture of books in the interest of scholarly publication. The publications of the ACLS during the last two years have been reflections of these experiments in manufacture, and nearly all of the volumes on the list of publications during 1952 have been prepared on an IBM typewriter in the rooms over the garage at the rear of the ACLS offices, and have been brought up to the lithoprinter's camera with a minimum of expense. While the principal purpose of the operation has been to secure dependable figures on costs, the enterprise has carried itself, including amortization of the initial capital outlay for equipment on an actuarial basis, besides providing composition at a low cost. A total of 7,247 pages has been prepared for the camera, of which 3,251 pages were produced in 1952. This service is available at a trifle over cost to the constituent societies.

It is becoming increasingly evident that the problem of scholarly publication is not limited solely to production. The question of distribution also looms large. During the coming months, emphasis will be placed on ways of reaching the potential market for scholarly books. Here, as with production, the ACLS is in a position to experiment with its own publications. As a first step, a list of all ACLS publications was included in the summer issue of the Newsletter, and subsequent issues have included mention of new books as they have appeared. The formulation of specialized mailing lists and direct approaches to college and university libraries are but two of the ways being considered to bring these publications to the attention of a wider public.

Area Studies. ACLS activities in the field which has come to be known, though unsatisfactorily, as "area studies" have been continuous over the past couple of decades and occupied a considerable part in the operations of 1952.

The Committee on Far Eastern Studies met once in Boston, on the occasion of the annual meetings of the American Oriental Society and the Far Eastern Association. Publication of A List of Published Translations from Chinese into English, French, and German (Part I, Literature exclusive of Poetry) was finally consummated. The Committee on Near Eastern Studies met twice, both times in New York. Progress was reported on enterprises already under way, such as the Near Eastern Translation Program and Books and Periodicals in Western Languages Dealing with the Near and Middle East. Elwell-Sutton's Guide to Iranian Area Study came from the press.

The Committee on Slavic Studies met once in New York. The Russian Translation Program and the Current Digest of the Soviet Press proceeded throughout the year. The former, with twenty-one volumes published or in press, comes to an end with the year as a result of the termination of the subvention. The Current Digest, now in its fourth year, seems assured, through action of the Rockefeller Foundation and the East European Fund, until 1958. The Committee sponsored a Conference on Soviet Economic Growth in New York on May 23-25, and is planning a similar Conference on Russian Intellectual History.

The Committee on South Asian Studies met once in New York. Under joint sponsorship with the Library of Congress, a quarterly accessions list, Southern Asia: Publications in Western Languages, appeared.

In the field of Canadian studies, members of the executive staff joined with representatives of the University of Rochester and invited specialists to discuss the question of intellectual relations between the United States and Canada.

For the decade prior to 1948, the ACLS maintained, either by itself or jointly with other Councils, a Committee on Latin American Studies. Recently, the question has been raised as to the advisability of reconstituting an ACLS committee in this field. On May 12, advantage was taken of another meeting of Latin American specialists in New Orleans to hold a conference of specialists from southern institutions. The conference produced an interesting discussion but no very significant proposals as to future operations.

Mortimer Graves suggests that current experience with committees on areas raises a question as to whether we are not beginning to reach a point of diminishing returns from this form of organizational procedure. It is true that for twenty years some of the Council's most spectacular and effective work has been that connected with the committees on underworked area fields. It is equally true that we must question whether continued emphasis on the need for more fellowships, publication opportunities, funds for individual and collective enterprises of research, tools of study, and the acquisition and rendering available of research materials serves a very useful purpose. It is not that these needs are nonexistent; it is that they are not peculiar to the underworked fields of scholarship, but are common to all fields of the humanities.

Other attacks on the same problem should be explored. The most active committee of the ACLS, the Committee on the Language Program, concerns itself with all language and linguistic problems, no matter what the area of their reference. A proposal has recently been made that the ACLS assume an operation of some sort in the field of Oriental philosophy, designed to insinuate concern with Oriental philosophies into philosophy departments.

This is not to argue that we should forsake the areal for the disciplinary or departmental basis in the creation of ACLS committees, but only to point out that there is here an organizational problem which should engage our attention.

Miscellaneous. This year, the executive staff made progress in improving communication between the Council and its widening clientele. The Newsletter, started some three and a half years ago in an attempt to bring ACLS activities to the attention of a scholarly public beyond those individuals who were intimately associated with the Council or with its committees, is now being published on a quarterly basis. Individuals on fifty campuses have agreed to act as unofficial representatives of the Council and have accepted responsibility for publicizing ACLS activities among their colleagues.

Three members of the staff represent the ACLS on the twelve-member Committee of the Conference Board of Associated Research Councils. Its primary function—the selection of lecturers and advanced research workers for assistance under the Fulbright operation—has been expanded not only by the increasing number of countries being brought into the Fulbright program but also by the introduction into the operation of a much higher degree of planning, especially in the nature of special recruitment, and by the addition of responsibilities in the administration of dollar funds from the Whitney and Ford Foundations for foreign scholars eligible to Fulbright travel grants. The current work load on members is consequently very great and only to be justified if the program is of commensurate value to American scholarship.

The Humanities in the Next Decade. The greater part of the time of the Council at the 1953 annual meeting was devoted to the discussion of the humanities in the next decade. Discussion proceeded on the basis of a carefully drafted paper by Mortimer Graves and other members of the staff. In 1951, the Carnegie Corporation made the ACLS a terminal grant for general support, while the Rockefeller Foundation sharply reduced its support for administration, planning and fellowships. The Rockefeller Foundation explained its action as stemming not from any dissatisfaction with the achievements of the Council but rather from a belief that “as the representative of humanistic scholarship in the United States, the Council should not be dependent on any single agency for so large a proportion of its support.” In 1952, the Ford Foundation made a grant of $250,000 to the ACLS over a three-year period for the study of Asian languages. This is a promising start with the new and mammoth educational foundation, but it does not fully answer the problem of future support of the Council.

Delegates from the constituent societies agreed that there is an unfortunate tendency to take the humanities for granted. At the same time, even among the constituent societies, there is wide ignorance regarding the activities of the ACLS. As a holding company for the humanities, there is need for better public relations. In the words of Frank Knight, scholarship is a hard product to sell in a democratic society for the reason that the truth seldom sells itself. In spite of the lip service paid to the humanities, there is incessant need for defending the very existence of the study of mankind.

In the field of personnel, the humanities have consistently lost ground to the physical sciences, and even to the social sciences within their own circle. By 1965, the college population will probably be 85 per cent greater than today, unless some other educational process besides the college be devised. There are now approximately 50,000 permanently employed teachers of the humanities and social sciences in American colleges and universities. On the assumption that an increase of students calls for a commensurate increase of teachers, we shall need as many as 40,000 new teachers in 1965, to say nothing of replacements, half of whom should be in the humanities. But at the slow rate that scholars are being drawn into the professional humanities we will not be able to meet the increased demand for teachers without a destructive lowering of standards. Obviously, this problem requires a study of the life-cycle of the humanistic scholar as well as the development of fellowships and other means of promoting research.

Some delegates detected a breach between the humanists and the social scientists; others thought that there was no more than an unhappy lack of cooperation. Even if the latter is true, such lack of cooperation indicates an absence of realism on both sides. If the humanities be the study of man and of man's belief in mankind, then it is difficult to see how either discipline can forego the closest contact with the other. Some humanists claimed that the tax-exempt foundations had lost confidence in the social scientists and that humanists would do well to cash in on this opportunity by giving more attention to current problems. The accuracy of the allegation was disputed, and again cooperation was advised. It was generally agreed that there is no harmful competition between the ACLS and the Social Science Research Council. As planning and promoting agencies for scholarship, both organizations possess the highest utilitarian value.

Most delegates were of the opinion that scholars should bring the humanities to the general public by more effective writing for public consumption. Even among the humanities, which includes literature, the ability to combine scholarship with popular writing is all too rare. There should be no aspersions cast upon scholars who write popular books without loss of their intellectual honesty. If the scholarship is sound, the fact that such publication is financially profitable does not impair its intrinsic value nor its usefulness to the human race.

There was general agreement that the ACLS requires an endowment for administration and planning. To find more than the two or three million dollars necessary for an administrative endowment would be an impossible task. But even in attempting to raise this endowment, the ACLS should not proceed in any way to lessen the responsibility of the foundations for support of the planning and operation of scholarly activities by the Council.—KENNETH COLLEGROVE.

OTHER ACTIVITIES

Formation of a study group to reappraise the foreign economic policy of the United States was jointly announced in November by the Woodrow Wilson Foundation and the National Planning Association. The eight members of the group are: William Y. Elliott, Assistant to the Director for Foreign Activities, Office of Defense Mobilization, and Williams Professor of Government at Harvard University, chairman; Richard M. Bissell, Jr., consultant, Ford Foundation, and formerly Deputy Administrator of ECA; Courtney C. Brown, Assistant to the Chairman of the Board, Standard Oil Company of New Jersey; H. van B. Cleveland, Committee for Economic Development; Theodore Geiger, Chief of Research, National Planning Association; Harry D. Gideonse, President, Brooklyn College; Edward S. Mason, Dean, Littauer School of Public Administration, Harvard University; and Don K. Price, Deputy Chairman, Research and Development Board, Office of the Secretary of Defense.

The study group will examine the basic assumptions about the nature of the world economy on which the United States policy has been based and the specific methods by which we have been attempting to make our policy effective during the postwar period. In their final report, the members will assess the degree of success which our foreign economic policy has had to date, will analyze the main reasons why our policy has not been more successful, and will suggest the modifications, both in concept and in methods, which their findings show to be desirable. The group has agreed on an outline of its work and will ultimately prepare a book-length report of its findings and conclusions.

The National Planning Association has set up a Special Policy Committee on the Organization of the Executive Office of the President to recommend means of improving the President's staff. The Committee includes nineteen members who have long and varied experience with top-management problems gained in business, government, and the study of public administration. Sumner T. Pike, for six years a member of the Atomic Energy Commission and a former member of the Securities and Exchange Commission, has been designated chairman. Political scientist members of the NPA Committee include Louis Brownlow, Luther H. Gulick, and John D. Millett.

A constitutional convention of 99 members will meet at Nashville, Tennessee, in April, 1953, to undertake a limited revision of the state constitution. The convention is authorized to consider the amending clause, the compensation and expenses of legislators, the veto power, the right of suffrage, home rule, and local governmental consolidation. Professor Frank Prescott, of the University of Chattanooga, and Dr. C. C. Sims, of Middle Tennessee State College, are among the delegates. A voluntary group of political scientists and law teachers has been organized to provide studies for the delegates.

Boston University has announced the establishment of an African Research and Studies Program to be inaugurated formally on July 1, 1953. Dr. William O. Brown, now Chief of the African Research Branch in the U. S. Department of State, has been appointed director. This Program, to be established in the Boston University Graduate School, will be closely linked with the social sciences and related fields. Close liaison will be established with individual scholars and research organizations in the United States, Europe and Africa.

The Program will be designed to make a contribution to basic research and studies in the field of African affairs. Emphasis will be placed upon the objectives and fundamental analysis of economic, social, political and technical factors as they relate to social change in contemporary Africa. Consideration will be given to the historical background and the cultural or institutional context of these developments and problems. It is anticipated that such a program will not only serve the interest of scholars, but also will be of use to United States government agencies, and to private individuals and organizations concerned with African questions in the United States, Europe and Africa.

The primary focus of the Program will be on research, with an increasing stress on training in subsequent years. Courses and seminars will be offered in 1953-54 on geographic, cultural, social and political aspects of contemporary Africa. Plans have been made for the development of library resources, and fellowship support and publication requirements for the Program are under consideration.

The Maurice and Laura Falk Foundation has made a grant to Boston University of twelve thousand dollars for the academic year for citizenship education. Professor Edward R. Collier is chairman of the committee in charge of administration of the grant. Extensive plans have been made to afford students an opportunity to gain practical experience with political parties and pressure groups. Observations in the field are followed by conferences at which there is an evaluation of group tactics and programs and their relation to the democratic process.

The Institute of Public Service at Boston University, in cooperation with the United States Department of Agriculture Graduate School, is offering three courses this year for public employees in the New England region: "Position Classification," "Techniques for Effective Personnel Supervision," and "Federal Accounting Procedures." Although these courses are designed primarily for federal personnel in the New England area, state and local employees are invited to enroll. An advisory committee, consisting of federal regional directors and representatives, state department heads, mayors, city managers and students of public administration, has been established to provide general guidance. Each course will be under the supervision of a person concerned with training in one of the federal regional offices and will attempt to elicit maximum exchange of ideas on both theory and practice. Certificates will be given upon completion of courses.

The first steps toward establishment of a program to train students for public service and government research careers have been taken by Western Reserve University. Eighteen civic leaders, including men prominent in federal, state, county and municipal government, are on the advisory committee which is working out details of the program. Ralph J. Besse, vice-president of the Cleveland Electric Illuminating Company, is chairman of the committee. Proposals for the new program include: establishment of the degree of Master of Arts in Public Administration; non-credit studies for executives, creating an executive pool within industry for emergency drafting by the government; and research dealing with all government services, maintained and channeled through a permanent research clearing house.

The Department of Government of Washington Square College, New York University, has received a grant from the Maurice and Laura Falk Foundation of $36,000 for a three-year study of the political content of the newly established integrated course in social science and to evaluate the impact of such a course on student participation in active politics. A comparative study will be made between students enrolled in the social science course and a like number enrolled in the regular departmental introductory course, government in American society.

New York University's Department of Government has established a local Citizenship Clearing House for the Southern District of New York under the Citizenship Clearing House affiliated with New York University's Law Center. The purpose of the local Citizenship Clearing House is to work with the co-operating institutions in the District to the end that students in the several political science departments may be brought into contact with political leaders and encouraged to participate actively in the politics of their respective communities.

For the sixth consecutive year, the Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan will hold its Annual Summer Institute in Survey Research Techniques. This special program is designed to illustrate the theory and application of survey research to such fields as business and human relations, education, psychology and sociology, public affairs, public health, economics, statistics, etc. Again this year a special workshop will be offered in the practical application of survey research methods to these individual fields. The dates for this session are June 22 to July 17 and July 20 to August 14. Further information may be secured from the Survey Research Center, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, Michigan.

The Society for the Psychological Study of Social Issues, a division of the American Psychological Association, has announced the Industrial Relations Research Award (a $500 U. S. Government bond) to be presented to the individual whose research is judged most meritorious as a scientific contribution to the understanding of labor-management relations. This award has been made possible by a gift to the Society by the Harwood Manufacturing Corporation. Presentation of this year's award will be made at the annual meeting of the American Psychological Association in September, 1953.

Closing date for entries is May 1, 1953. Any research study completed during 1952 or 1953 will be eligible for consideration. Inquiries concerning the award should be addressed to Dr. S. Stansfield Sargent, Secretary, SPSSI, Department of Psychology, Barnard College, Columbia University, New York 27.

At Indiana University, Professors Joseph B. Kingsbury, John E. Stoner, Louis Lambert, and Edwin B. McPheron have been assisting the "Little Hoover Commission" of Indiana in its investigation of state administrative organization during the past year.

Paul H. Appleby, Dean of the Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, Syracuse University, spent the first half of the year in India on an assignment for the Ford Foundation. He resumed his duties at Syracuse with the beginning of the second semester.

Samuel J. Eldersveld, associate professor of political science at the University of Michigan, has been awarded a grant of $5,500 by the Ford Foundation for research in the field of behavioral science.

George C. Guins, lecturer in political science and Slavic languages at the University of California (Berkeley), delivered a paper on "Soviet Law in its Development since 1917 up to 1952" at the International Congress of Jurists in Berlin, July-August, 1952.

Leslie Lipson, University of California (Berkeley), delivered two lectures at the National War College, Washington, D. C., in November, on "The British Commonwealth and Colonies," and "The United Kingdom."

Karl Loewenstein, of Amherst College, participated last August in the meeting of the Executive Committee of the Academy of Comparative Law to prepare the program for the next Congress of Comparative Law (1954). In September, he delivered addresses at the meeting of the International Law Association at Luzern on the subject "Sovereignty and International Cooperation" and at the meeting of the International Political Science Association at The Hague on the subject "The Role of the Political Ideologies."

Roscoe C. Martin, professor of political science at Syracuse University, delivered a series of lectures at the University of Puerto Rico during the latter half of January on the general theme of emergent trends in public administration.

Dayton D. McKean, of the University of Colorado, delivered the Pi Sigma Alpha Lecture at the University of Utah on February 12, 1953. His subject was "Group Dynamics in American Politics." This event is presented annually by the Institute of Government at the University of Utah.

Emery E. Olson, Dean of the School of Public Administration, University of Southern California, returned to Turkey during the summer of 1952 to act as chairman of a United Nations staff of experts participating with a Turkish academic and governmental group in the planning of an Institute of Public Administration at the University of Ankara. Dean Olson was a member of the Barker Economic Mission to Turkey for the International Bank in 1950. Five professors from the University of Ankara are now being trained in public administration over an eighteen-months period as a technical assistance project under the Mutual Security Administration.

Herbert A. Simon, professor of administration in the Graduate School of Industrial Administration, Carnegie Institute of Technology, is directing a project investigating human behavior in business and other organizations. The study is being financed by a grant of $30,000 from the Ford Foundation. Professor Simon is also one of 45 scholars who received individual grants of $5,500 from the Ford Foundation for research in fields related to human behavior.

NOTES ON MILITARY VOTING IN 1952

On March 28, 1952, President Harry S. Truman transmitted to the Congress the report made to him by the Special Committee on Service Voting of the American Political Science Association.¹ A presidential message accompanied the report, endorsing the work of the Committee and requesting the passage of legislation recommended in the document.

Finding that twenty-four of the states make it unduly difficult, and in some instances impossible, for absent members of the armed forces to vote, the Special Committee urged the enactment of a temporary national law, applicable to the 1952 election only, which would provide a federal ballot for servicemen whose states did not afford them an opportunity to vote on reasonable terms. The defects found in state voting laws were the following: failure to make provision for absent voting, denial of the suffrage to members of the regular military establishment, requirement of personal registration, refusal to accept the standard post-card form furnished by the Department of Defense as an application for an absentee ballot, and tardy dispatch of absentee ballots, making it difficult for military personnel to receive and return their ballots in time to have them counted. The expectation of the Special Committee that the states themselves would not remedy these defects before the 1952 election was borne out by events.

Senators Green (R. I.), Humphrey (Minn.), and Lehman (N. Y.) sponsored a bill which followed closely the federal law proposed by the Special Committee on Service Voting. This measure (S. 3061) passed the Senate without a record vote and without serious manifestation of opposition to its basic features on June 20. A companion measure (E.R. 7571), sponsored by Representative McCormack (Mass.), however, died in committee, caught in the legislative log jam at the end of the session.

No more fortunate was the recommendation of the Special Committee that existing federal law affirming the right of absent servicemen to vote without registering and without payment of poll tax, applicable "in time of war," be amended so that its guarantees would apply in time of peace as well. Doubt as to the constitutionality of such guarantees was offered as the reason for rejecting this recommendation by a House committee, which noted the "tendency to be impatient with constitutional restrictions whenever they stand in the way of legislation that is desirable."²

The net result of the report made by the Special Committee on Service Voting in terms of legislation to date has not been encouraging. It is likely, however, that many states will amend faulty voting laws in 1953. The Drafting Committee of the Council of State Governments has included in its program of "Suggested State Legislation for 1953" measures to eliminate the barriers to service voting. If such measures are enacted, the work of the Association's Special Committee will not have been fruitless.

Reports on the military vote in 1952 will be fragmentary. In no more than a dozen states will there be any computation of the size of the service vote. Information furnished to the Department of Defense by the secretaries of state of six states indicates that the percentage of servicemen of voting age who voted in 1952 falls considerably short of the comparable percentage in 1944.

These figures are somewhat surprising in view of the large turnout at the polls in the recent presidential election. Approximately 62 per cent of the total population of voting age voted in 1952, whereas the 1944 vote represented 56 per cent of the population of voting age. The decline in the service vote, given an opposite trend in the civilian vote, poses an interesting problem for specialists in voting behavior.

A poll of the student body at the United States Naval Academy disclosed that 67 per

State	Percentage of Potential Military Voters Who Actually Voted
	1944	1952
Maryland	24.8	21.1
New Jersey	51.3	28.6

cent of the midshipmen of voting age cast ballots in 1952. When allowance is made for those from states which absolutely barred them from voting (New Mexico, South Carolina, and Texas), the figure becomes 73 per cent of the men of voting age resident in the forty-five states which granted suffrage to absent military personnel. In great part, presumably, educational differences would explain the differential between the high turnout on the part of midshipmen and the low turnout among service personnel generally.

Meeting residence requirements for voting is a major problem for members of the armed services. During 1952, California contributed something toward the solution of this problem when the Attorney-General of the State held that residence on a federal military reservation within California for the period prescribed by statute satisfies the State's residence requirement for voting. This ruling, subsequently upheld by an inferior court,² has yet to be passed on by the State's highest tribunal. California appears to be the only state which interprets the residence requirement for voting so leniently, but its ruling is worthy of imitation elsewhere.—WILLIAM B. PRENDERGAST.

RESEARCH ON THE PRESIDENTIAL NOMINATING PROCESS IN 1952

The Association's Cooperative Research Project on Convention Delegations is preparing a report on state and local aspects of the presidential nominating process in 1952. The report is being organized on a state-by-state basis, with sections for as many states as possible.

In November, 1952, the Association received a second grant of $24,830 for the project from the donors of the original grant of $30,000.

² Arapajolu v. McMamin, District Court of Appeal, 1st App. Dist., Division Two (unreported).

Renewed arrangements were then agreed upon with the Brookings Institution under which Paul T. David is continuing as project director. The officers of the Association also concluded that a special advisory committee should be appointed, which will have two functions: (1) to advise the project director and the Executive Director of the Association on the continuation and the completion of the work; and (2) to advise the officers of the Association, when the time comes, as to the merits of the final report of the project and its readiness for publication under the sponsorship of the Association.

The membership of the Advisory Committee is as follows: Arthur N. Holcombe (chairman), Louis Brownlow, Richard S. Childs, Alexander Heard, Peter H. Odegard, Louise Overacker, and James K. Pollock.

The Committee held its first meeting on December 2, 1952, and will probably meet again early in April, 1953, at which time it will consider a preliminary draft of portions of the report. The report is planned for completion in manuscript by June, 1953.

The staff at work in the Washington office of the project, in addition to Dr. David, has included Esther Cole Franklin, Ralph M. Goldman, and Robert V. L. Wright, Jr. Professor Malcolm Moos of Johns Hopkins University has also joined the staff on a part-time basis to assist in editing the draft report.

The existing work is based on field materials secured as indicated by the notes concerning the project that appeared in the June and September, 1952, issues of this REVIEW. When further project financing became assured, a special effort was made to secure additional field work in the states where only one delegation had been studied. These efforts appear to have been successful in at least 11 states: Maine, New Hampshire, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Louisiana, South Dakota, Nebraska, Montana, Colorado, and Arizona. In addition, in two of the states for which no field reports had been received, new arrangements have been made for consolidated state studies, as follows: New Jersey (Harry R. Davis, on leave from Beloit College); Oklahoma (Cortez A. M. Ewing, University of Oklahoma).

In the earlier stages of the project, complete coverage through field work was not considered a feasible objective, and it remains unlikely that it will be attained. The final project report will include a consolidated roster of the more than 300 persons who have been active as project participants.—PAUL T. DAVID.

APPOINTMENTS AND STAFF CHANGES

Charles Aikin, University of California (Berkeley), spent the summer of 1952 in Germany, where he undertook a study of the German-American Exchange of Persons Program under a grant from the Institute of Social Sciences.

Benjamin Baker, formerly of Hofstra College, has been appointed lecturer at Rutgers University. He will specialize in municipal and public administration.

John W. Baker, formerly at the University of California (Berkeley), has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Florida for 1952-53.

Stephen K. Bailey, associate professor of political science at Wesleyan University, was elected Mayor of Middletown, Connecticut, on October 6, 1952.

Russell Barrett, who recently received his degree from the University of Melbourne, has been appointed acting instructor in political science for 1952-53 at the University of California (Berkeley).

Bohus Benes, former Consul General of Czechoslovakia at San Francisco, was a visiting lecturer at the Ohio State University during the autumn quarter, giving courses in Soviet affairs and international organization.

George J. Bereday, recently a graduate student at Harvard University, is teaching comparative modern government at Boston College. He also serves as a consultant to the Harvard Russian Center.

Thomas C. Blaisdell, Jr., director of the Bureau of International Relations, University of California (Berkeley), was on leave during November to serve with the United Nations Technical Assistance Board in reviewing technical assistance programs of specialized agencies.

Joan Bondurant, who was awarded the Ph.D. degree in September, 1952, at the University of California (Berkeley), is undertaking study and research in India under a Social Science Research Council fellowship.

Daniel M. Braum has been appointed visiting professor of political science at the University of Michigan for a two-year period, beginning December 15, 1952. He has been assigned to the Institute of Public Administration, University of the Philippines, where he will serve as an in-service training consultant and teach courses in office management and related subjects. Professor Braum was formerly Chief, Training Branch, General Services Administration, Washington, D. C.

Burton R. Brazil is serving as instructor in political science at Stanford University during the academic year 1952-53.

Arthur W. Bromage, of the University of Michigan, is on sabbatical leave during the spring semester and is making a comparative field study of Irish and English municipal government. He has received a grant from the Faculty Research Fund at the University of Michigan in support of this project.

Edward H. Buehrig, associate professor in the department of government at Indiana University, has returned from his leave of absence to work on a research project with the Brookings Institution in Washington, D. C. Professor Buehrig's leave extended through the academic year 1951-52 and the first semester of 1952-53.

Eugene Burdick has recently been appointed assistant to the new chancellor at the University of California (Berkeley). He will continue to offer course work in political theory.

James L. Burke, S.J., chairman of the department of government at Boston College since 1938, has been appointed Dean of the Boston College Graduate School. He is also serving as a member of the national executive committee of the Jesuit Educational Association.

Ardath W. Burks, assistant professor at Rutgers University, is doing research in Japan under a Social Science Research Council award.

Eleanor Bushnell has accepted a teaching appointment at San Francisco State College.

Leo Cagan began a year's leave of absence from San Francisco State College on February 1, 1953. During his leave he will serve as a public administration specialist with the United Nations Secretariat in New York City.

George Catlin, who taught in the 1952 summer session at the University of California (Berkeley), also spent the fall term as visiting professor of political science at that institution.

Hugh Clokie has been reappointed lecturer in political science, University of California (Berkeley), to offer work in the dependent areas and comparative government fields.

Francis W. Coker, professor emeritus at Yale University, taught at the University of North Carolina during the winter quarter. This is the fourth successive year that Professor Coker has taught for one quarter at North Carolina.

Morris W. H. Collins, Jr., assistant professor of political science at the University of Georgia, was appointed director of the Bureau of Public Administration at that institution on October 1, 1952. Mr. Collins has been acting director since the reactivation of the Bureau on July 1, 1951.

Thomas Albert Corbett, O.P., has been appointed assistant professor of politics at the Catholic University of America.

Robert F. Cushman has been advanced to an assistant professorship at the Ohio State University.

Robert T. Daland has been promoted to the rank of assistant professor of political science at the University of Alabama.

James Davies, who received his degree from the University of California (Berkeley) in January, 1952, has been reappointed to a post-doctoral fellowship at the Survey Research Center, University of Michigan.

Guenter Decker, who holds a research assistantship in international studies at the Goethe University in Frankfurt and is in this country under State Department auspices during the current academic year, was a visiting lecturer at the Ohio State University for the autumn quarter, giving a course in international law.

David R. Deener, formerly of Duke University and the University of Pittsburgh, has been appointed to an associate professorship of political science at Tulane University.

Conley H. Dillon has received an extension of his leave from Marshall College to continue in his position in the Office of Price Stabilization, Washington, D. C., during 1952-53.

Christopher Dyer-Bennet has been appointed associate in political science at the University of California (Berkeley) for the 1952-53 academic year.

Russell H. Fifield will be on sabbatical leave from the University of Michigan during the academic year 1953-54. He will spend the year studying the foreign policy of the Philippines and other nations in Southeast Asia. The project will be financed by a Fulbright grant and assistance from the University of Michigan Faculty Research Fund.

Ossip K. Flechtheim, who was on leave from Colby College during 1951-52, has resigned his position at Colby to accept the offer of a chair in comparative government and politics at the Deutsche Hochschule für Politik in Berlin-Schoeneberg. Dr. Flechtheim has been acting as a consultant to the German Federal Minister of the Interior and has also been appointed contributing editor of the new monthly publication Politische Literatur.

Julian Friedman has been reappointed lecturer in political science at the University of California (Berkeley) for the 1952-53 year. Mr. Friedman is offering a course on political institutions in Africa.

Emanuel R. Fuchs has been appointed staff economist to the United States Department of Interior's Missouri Basin Field Committee, which coordinates the programs and activities of Interior agencies engaged in the Missouri Basin development program.

Hubert S. Gibbs was promoted to an assistant professorship in political science at Boston University in July, 1952.

Gilbert S. Gilchrist has been awarded a General Education Board fellowship and is on leave of absence from the University of the South for a year's study at the Johns Hopkins University.

Heinz Guradze's appointment as guest professor in international organization and political theory at the University of Cologne has been extended through the winter of 1952-53.

David Vance Guthrie, Jr., formerly an instructor at the University of North Carolina, has joined the department of political science at the University of the South.

Andrew Gyorgy, formerly of Louisiana State University, is a visiting lecturer in international relations at Boston University.

Luther G. Hagard, Jr., recently a graduate student at the University of Minnesota, has been appointed assistant professor of political science at The Citadel.

Lashley G. Harvey has resumed his duties as chairman of the department of government at Boston University after a year's leave of absence as a Fulbright scholar at the London School of Economics and Political Science. While in London, he gave a series of ten lectures on American government and ten lectures on the administrative process. Professor Robert P. Benedict was the acting chairman of the department during the absence of Professor Harvey.

William C. Havard, of Northwestern State College, Natchitoches, Louisiana, is teaching at Louisiana State University during the absence of Professor Kimbrough Owen, on leave.

Robert S. Hayton, candidate for the Ph.D. degree at the University of California (Berkeley), is spending a year of study in South America on a Doherty fellowship. He is also the recipient of a Pan American World Airways Travel fellowship, through the Institute of International Education, for study in Chile.

Francis Heller, who has been on leave with the U. S. Army, has resumed his teaching duties as associate professor of political science at the University of Kansas.

Paul Heppie has returned to his position as assistant professor in the department of history and government at Kansas State College. Mr. Heppie spent the first semester in Canada, where he was engaged in research on Canadian political parties.

Karel Hulicka, who received the Ph.D. degree from the University of California (Berkeley) in January, 1952, has been appointed acting instructor in political science for 1952-53.

Dunning Idle, formerly a Foreign Service reserve officer, has joined the staff at the University of Miami as visiting professor of political science.

Harry V. Jaffa, assistant professor of political science at the Ohio State University, is on leave during the current academic year. He holds a Ford Foundation grant.

Henry L. Janssen has been appointed lecturer in political science at the University of California, Santa Barbara Campus, for 1952-53.

Claudius O. Johnson, professor and former chairman of the department of history and political science at Washington State College, has been appointed a Fulbright lecturer at the University of Sydney and Melbourne for the coming academic year. He has been granted leave of absence from February 1, 1953 to February 1, 1954.

Joseph Kaiser, of the University of Tübingen, Germany, will be a visiting lecturer at the Ohio State University during the spring and summer quarters, giving courses in Western European political institutions and in international law.

Hugh E. Kelso has returned to the staff of the political science department at the State University of Iowa after being on leave of absence for 17 months while serving with the Armed Forces.

Lane W. Lancaster is on leave of absence from the University of Nebraska during the second semester of the present academic year.

IN MEMORIAM

Charles E. Merriam was born in Hopkinton, Iowa, November 15, 1874, and died in Rockville, Maryland, January 8, 1953. He was a charter member of the American Political Science Association, served on many of its committees over a period of forty years, and was President of the Association in 1925. He was a member of the faculty of the University of Chicago from 1900 until his retirement in 1940, and was noted as a stimulating teacher and a helpful adviser both to his students and his younger colleagues.

His academic interests shifted from time to time in well-marked periods, in accordance with his off-campus activities. He devoted himself initially to municipal government and reform, the principal business on the agenda of the first decade of this century. He was elected to the City Council of Chicago in 1909, and was a candidate for Mayor in 1911, losing by a narrow margin to Carter Harrison. He was reelected to the Council in 1913, but was unsuccessful in resuming his political career after returning from military service in World War I.

His interest now turned to political parties, stimulated by his own experience, his association with Theodore Roosevelt in the Bull Moose campaign of 1912, and the inescapable fascination that he found in politics. This new center of attention resulted in his book, The American Party System, and in studies of elections, political leadership, and citizenship. Dissatisfied with the relatively narrow content of political science, he began a private reading course in economics, sociology, and anthropology, and then devoted his inventive mind to the ways and means of cross-fertilizing political science with these sister disciplines. He took an active part in the Conferences on the Science of Politics, and was the principal founder and the first President of the Social Science Research Council. This was one of his major organizational achievements.

His underlying academic interest was in the history of political ideas and the development of political theory in the context of contemporary life. His first contribution was his doctoral dissertation at Columbia, The History of Sovereignty Since Rousseau; his last two, The New Democracy and the New Despotism and Systematic Politics. The final decade of his teaching was devoted to the defense of the democratic way of life, and to the criticism of authoritarian institutions.

Charles Merriam served on many public and quasi-public bodies, among others the Commission of Inquiry on Public Service Personnel, the Commission on Social Trends, the National Resources Planning Board, the President's Committee on Administrative Management, and the Loyalty Review Board.

He was influential in the formation of Public Administration Clearing House and in the establishment in Chicago of the national headquarters of about fifteen organizations of local and state public service officials, known nationally and internationally as "1313." Merriam served on many of their committees, and as a member of the Board of the Spelman Fund assisted in their early financing.

He was always interested in the improvement of governmental machinery. In succession he spoke for the short ballot and the safeguarding of election machinery, the initiative and referendum, the city manager plan, charter revision in Chicago and the rewriting of the Illinois State constitution, city planning and the conservation of national resources through state and federal planning, and the reorganization of the federal administrative system.

Charles Merriam had an uncanny perception of emerging trends and great skill in putting young men to work in promising fields. His eye was always on the horizon, and he was always busy searching for ways and means of ferrying mankind to a happier destination. His host of friends and students will remember him as a man who enlivened any gathering of which he was a member. He was friendly, genial, fond of company and conversation, and full of wisdom. He had an extraordinary capacity for commanding the respect, the loyalty, and the affection of those who knew him. Perhaps no political scientist of his generation exerted a greater influence, not only within his own field but upon the constructive development of the social sciences and their contribution to public affairs.—LEONARD D. WHITE.

Julius Turner, associate professor of political science at Allegheny College, died December 24, 1952, at the age of thirty. Already he had won recognition as one of the most promising young scholars in the field of American politics. His published work reflected skill and ingenuity in analysis and both imagination and respect for data in interpretation. At the time of his death he had under way, with the aid of a Social Science Research Council fellowship, an analysis of congressional elections with a view toward a more complete understanding of the extent and limits of party competition. Fragments of this work, some of which were left in sufficiently finished form for publication, indicate that it would have compelled considerable modification of conventional theories of the party system.

Professor Turner had received his Ph.D. degree in 1950 from the Johns Hopkins University, where he also served as a junior instructor. His doctoral thesis, initiated under the direction of V. O. Key, Jr., was published under the title, Party and Constituency: Pressures on Congress. He taught at Boston University before moving to Allegheny. He had achieved already an unusual mastery of the art of teaching, and had gone far in establishing mutually valuable friendships in his profession. His untimely death is the occasion of loss and regret which extend far beyond relationships which are merely personal. In evidence of this fact, a number of his friends at different institutions throughout the country have instituted at the Johns Hopkins University a Julius Turner Award, to be given annually for the most outstanding essay submitted in the field of political science.—CARL B. SWISHER.

The first serious account of Labour's foreign policy aspirations and performance, it graphically describes Britain's postwar position as a power with world interests but no longer a world power. Against this background the volume analyzes the ambiguity in Britain's espousal of European Union, the differing American and British policies toward China, and Britain's successes and failures in coming to terms with Asian nationalism.

Introduction to Government

by ROBERT RIENOW

In this basic textbook, simple and direct in its style and reflecting the long teaching experience of its author, the student is introduced to the principles of government by studying actual governments at work in actual societies. Throughout, Professor Rienow's emphasis is on government in the United States. The author devotes an entire section of his book, however, to an analysis of four types of government in order to highlight (1) the characteristic features of the American political system and (2) the idea that that system, in its operation and development, must take account of systems that differ from it, and often differ fundamentally.

This is a realistic introduction to political science for the student whose work will end with the basic course and a practical introduction to the study of government for the student who will go on to advanced work.

Elements of Political Science

by ALFRED DE GRAZIA

This text introduces the student to the elements of political science. It combines traditional materials and recent studies in a smoothly integrated and readable form, carrying the student into the areas of political behavior and governmental institutions. Broad in scope, logical, and well-grounded in the facts of political life, it will arouse general interest in the problems of political science, and special interest in political science as a gateway to liberal education. From this book the student will be able to move easily into more concentrated and advanced study of political parties, comparative government, international relations and other fields of political science. Students of this volume will acquire increased competence as citizens.

The Political System

by DAVID EASTON

Serious students of politics will find The Political System stimulating and useful for its reflective view of the state of American political science today. The argument of the book, briefly stated, is that political scientists could better explain the structure and processes of political life if they had paid closer attention to general or systematic theory.

No attempt is made in The Political System to present a general theory. Instead, the author discusses some of the problems that confront political scientists if they are to develop a systematic science.

No other book provides so lucid an analysis of the types of political thought, their functions, and their interrelations. Students of political science will find it indispensable for its persuasive exposition of the nature and scope of their subject. It sharply outlines the tasks challenging a new generation of political scientists.

DEMOCRACY IN THE UNITED STATES

William H. Riker
Lawrence College

Here is a new textbook of American government that analyzes our political institutions in order to answer the question: How can the democratic ideal be achieved in American practice? To answer this question Dr. Riker analyzes all the major characteristics and institutions of American government and politics.

In the introductory chapter the author discusses and defines "democracy" basing his discussion and definition on these contributions to political literature: Pericles' Funeral Oration, The Agreement of the People, The Declaration of Independence, The Declaration of the Rights of Man and Citizen, and The Gettysburg Address. Subsequent chapters analyze successively suffrage, the Constitution, Congress, the Presidency, the Supreme Court, and Federalism.

The order of the subjects is not haphazard but grows out of the definition of democracy in Chapter I which states that the method of democracy is "electoral responsibility." For this reason, the author considers particular institutions in order of their closeness to the electoral process: suffrage first, civil liberties and the party system next, and the constitutional system third. Published in February.

By ROBERT A. DAHL

Just published, this is a brilliant and original work, one which no political scientist—teacher, scholar, or student—can afford to miss. One of its principal contributions is a stimulating analysis of basic political and economic theory in which the two are closely integrated. Economic processes are described as processes of rational calculation and control, and competing systems are compared. The final portion of the book discusses economic planning, examining carefully and methodically the four basic methods of calculation and control in politico-economic life: the price system, hierarchy, polyarchy (democracy), and bargaining. $5.00

The Legislative Process in Congress

By George B. Galloway, Legislative Reference Service, Library of Congress

An up-to-date, comprehensive, and authoritative account, based upon more than ten years of first-hand observation of Congress in action. The author deals objectively and candidly with both the strengths and the weaknesses of our national legislature. His book describes the operation of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 and contains proposals for further reforms in the machinery and methods of Congress.

Aid, Trade, and the Tariff

By Howard S. Piquet, Legislative Reference Service, Library of Congress

Without taking sides, the author discusses what would happen if the United States should alter or even suspend temporarily all or part of the United States tariffs and quotas. Tables accounting for four fifths of all dutiable imports into the United States list American productions, imports, ratio of imports to domestic production, duties and ad valorem equivalents thereof, and exports for the calendar year 1951.

A Primer of Statistics for Political Scientists

By V. O. Key, Jr., Harvard University

A handbook for students of politics without formal training in statistics. Enough of the general logic of scientific inquiry is treated to form a background for the discussion of quantitative techniques.

THOMAS Y. CROWELL COMPANY 432 Fourth Avenue, New York 16, N.Y.

OXFORD BOOKS

BRITISH GOVERNMENT

By HIRAM MILLER STOUT. A complete picture of Great Britain today, in which a prominent political scientist surveys its present political system in the light of wartime and post-war changes. Mr. Stout discusses the modern functions of such institutions as the Monarchy, Parliament, the Cabinet and Civil Service. In addition, he provides a wealth of up-to-date information on many controversial subjects, from nationalization and the welfare state to Commonwealth relations and colonial policy.

THE QUEST FOR COMMUNITY

A Study in the Ethics of Order and Freedom

By ROBERT A. NISBET. Modern man finds himself rootless and alone in a contemporary society which tends increasingly toward centralization and uniformity. Can he rediscover his sense of community and, at the same time, preserve his freedom? Tracing the role of the State throughout history, Mr. Nisbet presents "a thought-provoking analysis which gets at the root causes of our moral malaise . . . It will well repay reading."—Saturday Review Syndicate.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION - 3rd Edition

JOHN M. PFIFFNER, University of Southern California; and R. VANCE PRESTHUS, Michigan State College.

This revision of a well-known and widely used textbook realistically analyzes the dynamics of public administration, administrative organization, personnel management, financial administration, administrative law and regulation, and administrative responsibility. The authors accent the informal or "human relations" aspect of organization and management, drawing widely upon studies in the social sciences that illuminate the nature of group action, individual motivation, and leadership. Public administration is viewed as part of a larger social process which includes legislatures, pressure groups, and the separation of powers. Approx. 590 pages. $6.00

• Fundamentals of Political Science

Edited by OSSIP K. FLECHTHEIM, Colby College

An up-to-date, integrated textbook, comparing ideas and practices of all major nations. Analyzes government and politics from historical, philosophical, anthropological, psychological viewpoints. 584 pages. $5.50

• Federal Administrative Law

RINEHART JOHN SWENSON, New York University

Thoroughly examines the growth, nature and control of administrative action in the United States today. Makes well-considered recommendations with respect to just determination of legal issues of broad public concern. 376 pages. $6.

THE AMERICAN SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT. New 3rd Edition

By JOHN H. FERGUSON, The Pennsylvania State College, and DEAN E. MCHENRY, University of California, Los Angeles. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. In press.

Thoroughly revised in a more lively and readable style and including and incorporating the 1952 election and new data of the 1950 census, this new edition is organized to include national, state, and local governments. Historical background; general principles; legislative, executive, judicial, and federal powers; administrative organization; and concise treatment of state and local governments are treated. Illustrations are redrawn and expanded.

THE AMERICAN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT. New 3rd Edition

By JOHN H. FERGUSON, The Pennsylvania State College, and DEAN E. MCHENRY, University of California, Los Angeles. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. In press.

For those who wish a separate coverage of only the national government institutions and functions, here is a revised and up-to-date edition containing only those sections from the authors' THE AMERICAN SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT. Presentation is simplified and clarified, and a better integration of treatment of powers and functions is achieved. Recent trends are pointed out, and the activities of the United Nations are emphasized.

PROBLEMS OF AMERICAN GOVERNMENT

By NEAL RIEMER, The Pennsylvania State College. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. 363 pages, (clothbound) $3.75 (paperbound) $2.75.

A supplementary book of readings dealing with contemporary questions of American government. Seventeen controversial problems are included. Each is prefaced with a brief introduction which raises the general issue. Then selections dealing with specific problems, are presented from various sources—newspapers, campaign speeches, congressional debates, etc. A provocative and stimulating approach for the student.

CASES ON THE CONSTITUTION

Edited by J. P. FRANK, Yale University. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. 339 pages, $3.50.

A collection of approximately 60 cases and other readings illustrative of the American constitution. An auxiliary teaching tool for introductory government courses, this text can also be used in constitutional law courses where a short, light book is preferred.

OLIVER

This is the fourth full-length book on Korea by Robert Oliver, and it is by all odds the best of the lot. It is in some respects the most informative and the most moving of any of the analyses of the Korean conflict that have come to this reviewer's attention. . .

There is an abundance of scholarship in this book and ample documentation, both statistical and otherwise. In that sense it is a technical work and a commendable one. But to many persons the warmth of its human approach will overshadow this technical excellence. Sharing in that approach can give us all a better insight into the real meaning of the Korean struggle and help us to arrive at a better "Verdict in Korea."

The New York Times Book Review

A lot of words have been written about what has been done and what should be done in Korea, but none has as much the sound of authority as this work by Robert Oliver.—Springfield News & Leader

Verdict in Korea . . . is going to open the eyes of a great many Americans on the whys and wherefores of the most baffling war in our history, because it goes behind the scenes and tells the story behind the headlines.—Macon News

. . . The American who probably knows more about the Republic of Korea than any other white man.—Kansas City Star

The prose of the author is marvelously readable.—Syracuse Post Standard

Verdict in Korea should be read by everyone who has lost track of the reasons why the United Nations went into Korea, or who has never had the reasons clearly in his mind.—Bakersfield Californian

Verdict in Korea should interest particularly those who desire definite information about that nebulous country on which American money and American blood have been lavished since June, 1950.—Beaumont Enterprise

THE SOVIET IMPACT ON SOCIETY

by Dagobert D. Runes

In what manner has Kremlin-controlled Sovietism raised or lowered human standards? Is man in Soviet society master of his own fate? May he follow unhampered his self chosen vocation and avocation? Can he express his ideas and feelings as he wishes? Can he join his neighbors in groups, unions and confederations? Are his social or cultural activities dictated by political potentates?

To these and other basic questions the distinguished philosopher offers an unbiased reply, out of his direct observations and studies.

Democracy in the Dominions

By ALEXANDER BRADY

A revised and enlarged edition (1952) of Professor Brady's noted study of the nature and development of democratic institutions in Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa. He presents an original and rewarding comparison, one which has not previously been undertaken in such detail or by so well qualified an observer.

The second edition includes much fresh material. It notes significant changes in Dominion institutions since early 1947, and has an entire section wherein the broader and comparative aspects of democracy in the Dominions are more fully analysed and the contemporary threats to democracy in the whole western world assessed.

"Professor Brady's book is a monumental contribution to the better understanding of the Dominions."—C. Hartley Grattan, in the New York Times.

INTRODUCTION TO GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Richard Carlton Snyder and H. Hubert Wilson, Princeton University

"The editors have been brilliantly successful, not only in conceiving and blue-printing their new approach, but also in assembling this large collection of stimulating and, above all, pertinent articles. Excellent introductions for each section and article supply a unifying warp."

—American Political Science Review

"The book portrays well the interrelations of the social sciences in the formation and expression of political opinion and action. It should serve as a welcome antidote to students who have been forced in their study of government to undergo the systematic regimentation of multitudinous and arid details."

Please write to us if you plan to teach a course in State Government next summer or fall so that we may put you on our mailing list for an examination copy.

Dr. Graves's complete revision of this authoritative and standard text is now in press and will be ready for distribution late this spring. All users of earlier editions are familiar with the plan and character of the book; which has long been regarded as the text for students taking a college course in state government. The Fourth Edition contains the same wealth of up-to-date material as characterized the first three editions. A complete resetting of the text has made possible some reorganization at desirable points. Bibliographies at the ends of chapters have been shortened to selected reading lists.

DEMOCRACY AND FOREIGN POLICY

A CASE HISTORY

THE SINO-JAPANESE DISPUTE 1931-33

By R. BASSETT, M.A.

Lecturer in Political Science at the London School of Economics

This book contains a considerable amount of material that will be of great interest to people in America.

In particular it brings out striking parallels and differences in British opinion as regards first Manchuria, and later Korea. There is a critical analysis of Mr. Stimson's book "The Far Eastern Crisis," and an account of the illusions about American policy prevalent in Great Britain at the time of the Manchurian affair, and the lack of information in the British press concerning relevant events in the U.S.A.

GOVERNMENTS OF LATIN AMERICA

By MIGUEL JORRIN

Professor of Government and Director of the School of Inter-American Affairs, University of New Mexico

The AUTHOR'S unique qualifications make this new volume welcomed for its real contribution to the study of Latin American governments. Professor Jorin provides a background of 15 years' experience as a practicing lawyer in these countries (where he took part in administrative and electoral processes and was in the position to see violent changes in government) with 14 years of teaching and lecturing in both Latin American Countries and in the United States.

SPECIAL FEATURES OF THIS NEW TEXT

- Evolution of the patterns of governments are clearly indicated by the author's presentation of the contemporary problems of economic, political, institutional, and social conflicts from the colonial era to the present time.
- Topical approach of the subject matter facilitates the use of the comparative method on the study of these foreign governments.
- Author's conclusions summarize the basic features of the governmental institutions of the area, showing weaknesses as well as achievements.
- Maps, charts and discussion topics for each chapter aid in the study of this important subject.

Governments of Latin America was written for a junior or senior course. It is well suited for graduate work on area studies of Latin America. The usual prerequisites are American Government and Politics, and a history of Latin America. This text is well suited for a 3-hour, one-semester college course which the author combines with conference sessions and discussions of constitutional provisions.

PUBLIC PERSONNEL MANAGEMENT

By WILLIAM G. TORPEY

This text gives a realistic treatment of the processes, procedures and problems of personnel administration in the executive branches of federal, state and local governments.

It is well suited for government in-service courses for trainees, supervisors, administrators, and others concerned with personnel administration. Book is filled with a wealth of actual existing problems, up-to-date concepts, and interesting historical accounts showing how present statutes and procedures were derived.

LIBERTARIAN MOTIVATIONS ON THE VINSON COURT

C. HERMAN PRITCHETT

University of Chicago

Justice Frankfurter is fond of quoting an old English saying that "the devil himself knoweth not the mind of men."¹ The mind of a man who happens to be a judge is the center of many contending impulses when he is making it up, and an external reconstruction of the process is quite impossible. However, the rules of the game require that judges supply clues to their thought processes in the form of written opinions. In every major case decided by the Supreme Court, one or more of its members provide a written justification for the decision announced. The individualistic tradition of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence, moreover, permits justices who do not agree with the views of their brethren to say so, and to give their reasons for dissenting. Thus the Supreme Court on decision day takes on the aspect of a small legislature in which votes are cast pro and con on significant issues of public policy, with accompanying explanations much more coherent and systematic and better-reasoned than are customarily available in explanation of votes cast, say, in the United States Senate.

While it has not been usual to do so, these judicial votes can be subjected to the same kinds of analysis as have been traditionally employed for the study of legislative voting behavior. Thus Table I undertakes to throw light on the attitudes of members of the recent Court toward civil liberties claims by recording their votes as favoring or opposing the claimed liberties in some 84 nonunanimous cases decided during the six terms from October, 1946 to June, 1952.²

Such a table is useful, however, only if the analyst has some tenable hypothesis about the nature of the relations between a justice's decisions and his personal convictions. It would be naive to assume that justices in deciding cases are completely free to vote their own preferences, or that a voting record necessarily mirrors a justice's inner convictions. On the other hand, it would be even more naive to assume that a Supreme Court justice merely "looks up the law" on a subject and applies it to the case in hand.³

A workable hypothesis on Supreme Court decision-making must be formulated with an appreciation of the operating conditions under which the judge makes his choices. In many respects his situation is quite comparable with that of any individual who must make decisions on important matters within an institutional framework which brings to him questions for decision and provides mechanisms for making those decisions effective. Appellate courts share with legislatures the problem of decision-making in a collectivity of equals, in contrast to the conditions of decision-making in a hierarchy. We may tend to think of legislators as having greater freedom than judges in arriving at policy choices, but upon reflection it becomes obvious that legislators no more than judges are able to vote as free agents. They must think about what is good for their party. They must give some account to the probable effect of their vote on the prospects for reelection. They may decide to vote for something they do not want in order to get support for something they want very much. They may decide to vote for less than they want because their practical judgment tells them that is all they can get.

³ Chancellor Kent once explained how he arrived at decisions. He first made himself "master of the facts." Then, he continued: "I saw where justice lay, and the moral sense decided the court half the time; I then sat down to search the authorities. . . . I might once in a while be embarrassed by a technical rule, but I almost always found principles suited to my view of the case . . ." Quoted in Jerome Frank, Law and the Modern Mind (New York, 1930), p. 104.

A Supreme Court justice finds himself in much the same situation, though operating within a judicial rather than a legislative context does make for some differences. He does not have a constituency of electors or a party position to consider. But the rules and traditions of the Court supply institutional preferences with which his own preferences must compete. One of these institutional preferences, for example, is stare decisis, the rule of precedent. The individual judge may think that the precedents are wrong, or outmoded. If so, he may follow his personal preference and state his reasons for voting to change the law. He is free to do that. He is not free to ignore the precedents, to act as though they did not exist. He has free choice, but among limited alternatives and only after he has satisfied himself that he has met the obligations of consistency and respect for settled principles which his responsibility to the Court imposes upon him. His private views as an individual help to form and may be incorporated into his public views as a justice, but they are not the same thing.

What this means, in more concrete terms, is that when a civil liberties case comes to the Supreme Court, the justices are not asked whether they are more or less in favor of civil liberties. They are asked how the Court, consistently with its role as the highest judicial body in a federal system, should dispose of a proceeding, the basic facts in which have been found and the form of which has been given by lower judicial bodies. Under these circumstances some justices may not even choose to think of the civil liberties issue in the case. They may see the controlling problem as adherence or non-adherence to the precedents. They may think of the issue as judicial respect for legislative action. As participants in the judicial process they have a perfect right to choose from among the alternatives presented the ones which determine their view of the case.

Thus it is that a statistical table or "box score" such as Table I cannot be accepted as an index of personal attachment to libertarian values on the part of the justices. These votes were cast, not in their personal but in their judicial capacity, and represented their resolution of situations where many legitimate values may have been competing for attention. What the table does establish is the degree to which each member of the Court found it possible or desirable as a judge to prefer libertarian values over others present in the proceedings. These are what Mark DeWolfe Howe calls "relational statistics," and while Howe is a bitter critic of the statistical method as applied to judicial decisions, he is willing to admit that if interpreted on this basis box scores may be acceptable. But he adds the warning that relational statistics "have significance only when discriminating account is taken of all the values which are brought into relationship."⁴

Obviously it is impossible to identify all the values which each justice may have related to the decision of a case. But our working hypothesis is that a decision involving civil liberties questions will be primarily influenced by the interaction of two factors. One is the direction and intensity of a justice's libertarian sympathies, which will vary according to his weighting of the relative claims of liberty and order in our society. Theoretically, positions on a liberty-order attitude scale could range from an individualistic anarchism at one extreme to rigid authoritarianism on the other. The orthodoxy required for a Supreme Court appointment ensures, however, that the spread of opinion among members of that body will be much narrower.

The second factor is the conception which the justice holds of his judicial role and the obligations imposed on him by his judicial function. Every justice in deciding a case must give some thought to what is appropriate for him as a judge to do. The pressures which bear upon him are many, and they are mostly toward a pattern of conformity—conformity with precedents, conformity with the traditions of the law, conformity with public expectations as to how a judge should act, conformity toward established divisions of authority in a federal system based on the principle of separation of powers. While no justice can be oblivious to these pressures, they are not self-enforcing, and he is free to make his own interpretations of their requirements in guiding his own judicial conduct. The attitude scale involved may be thought of as ranging from an expansionist to a contractionist judicial philosophy, from broad to narrow judicial review, from judicial activism to judicial restraint.

Any attempt to rank justices on these two scales in an absolute fashion would be hopeless, but it should not be as difficult to locate them relatively to each other, and particularly by reference to their deviation from the Court's majority position at any one time. Table I shows that five members of the Vinson Court—Murphy, Rutledge, Douglas, Black, and Frankfurter—voted for libertarian claims substantially more often than the Court majority. In the terms of our hypothesis, the extremely high rate of support for libertarian claims registered by the first four of these justices suggests that they are strongly positive on both scales; their personal preferences must be strongly libertarian, and they must have a conception of their judicial function which permits or even requires them to give judicial effect to their libertarian preferences. Without assuming any absolute identity of views on their part, the motivation of these four justices can be characterized as libertarian activism.

The intense belief of the four libertarian activists in the principles of an open society could be endlessly demonstrated by reference to their opinions, but this statement of Black's must suffice for the purpose:

I view the guaranties of the First Amendment as the foundation upon which our governmental system rests and without which it could not continue to endure as conceived and planned. Freedom to speak and write about public questions is as important to the life of our government as is the heart to the human body. In fact, this privilege is the heart of our government. If that heart be weakened, the result is debilitation; if it be stilled, the result is death.⁵

The primacy which this view attaches to liberty over order has been given a theoretical form in the constitutional doctrine of the "preferred position" of civil liberties. This doctrine has fulfilled an essential purpose in strengthening the "clear and present danger" test as developed by Justices Holmes and Brandeis, and particularly in remedying a gap in Holmes' work. The rule which he normally applied in determining the constitutionality of legislation was the "reasonable man" test. As he said in his famous dissent to Lochner v. New York, he would not invalidate any statute "unless it can be said that a rational and fair man necessarily would admit that the statute proposed would infringe fundamental principles as they have been understood by the traditions of our people and our law."⁶ Yet when it came to the matter of enforcing the Espionage Act during the First World War, as applied against persons who had used their rights of free speech to try to induce resistance to the draft, Holmes developed a different test.

The question in every case is whether the words are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent. It is a question of proximity and degree.⁷

⁶ 198 U. S. 45 (1905). And in Meyer v. Nebraska Holmes refused to hold invalid a state law against the teaching of German language in the primary schools, because he believed that whether children in their early years should hear and speak only English at school was "a question upon which men reasonably might differ and therefore I am unable to say that the Constitution of the United States prevents the experiment from being tried." 262 U. S. 390 (1923).

To be sure, the constitutionality of the Espionage Act was not in question in the Schenck case. The clear and present danger test was being employed rather to determine how closely words had to be related to illegal acts in order to be infected with their illegality. But by 1927 Justice Brandeis, with Holmes' concurrence, had developed clear and present danger into a test for the constitutionality of statutes. In Whitney v. California Brandeis said that a legislative declaration that a danger existed justifying restrictions on speech and assembly created merely a "rebuttable presumption." If the conditions alleged by the legislature did not in fact exist, then the courts, guided by the clear and present danger test, should refuse to enforce the statute.⁸

Holmes and Brandeis never satisfactorily explained why legislation affecting First Amendment freedoms had to pass the clear and present danger test, while other legislative actions were held to the less stringent test of reasonableness.⁹ It was this failure which the preferred position argument remedied. Widely attributed to Stone's famous footnote in the 1938 case of United States v. Carolene Products Co.,¹⁰ the notion that courts and legislatures must observe higher standards when dealing with First Amendment values was accepted not only by the four libertarian activists, but also by Roberts in the 1939 handbill cases¹¹ and Jackson in the second flag salute case. Said Jackson:

The right of a State to regulate, for example, a public utility may well include, so far as the due process test is concerned, power to impose all of the restrictions which a legislature may have a "rational basis" for adopting. But freedoms of speech and press, of assembly, and of worship may not be infringed on such slender grounds. They are susceptible of restriction only to prevent grave and immediate danger to interests which the state may lawfully protect.¹²

Reenforced by the preferred position doctrine, the clear and present danger test was applied by the libertarians during the 1940's to a wide variety of new situations, from restraints on picketing to citations for contempt of court.¹³

This inventiveness was motivated by a crusading conception of the judicial function which is well reflected in Justice Murphy's statement that "The law knows no finer hour than when it cuts through formal concepts and transitory emotions to protect unpopular citizens against discrimination and persecution."¹⁴ Unpopular citizens of recent years, or at least "underdogs" in terms of their power positions, about whom the Court's libertarians have been concerned are such groups as aliens, American Indians, Jehovah's Witnesses, injured workmen seeking compensation from their employers, Communists, and defendants in criminal cases.

Sympathy for the underdog can seldom be given effect without a corresponding rejection of the claims of the upperdog. A decision that Jehovah's Witnesses can operate their loudspeaker in a small park on Sunday devalues the claims of those who just want to sit in the park and relax.¹⁵ The right of a fascist to harangue his followers involves some conflict with the right of the community to be free from riots.¹⁶ The activist "infracaninophile"¹⁷ consistently favors the injured few over the allegedly suffering many.

Libertarian susceptibility to the case for the underdog often seems grounded in the judge's sympathetic identification with his plight,¹⁸ but where the judge embraces the activist solution there must also be operating a sense of personal responsibility for the result achieved by the Court's decision. This incubus can be avoided by a conception that the Court is operating within limits and manipulating its powers according to external standards provided by the legal system.¹⁹ But the activist cannot accept this limited role. He cannot rid himself of the notion that the Court does have a range of discretion, that there are choices open to him. Consequently he must make the choice which will give the right result. He cannot reconcile himself to the idea that there can be a wrong without a remedy—and a judicial remedy, not merely a legislative or electoral remedy.

Consistency for the libertarian activist is the consistency of seeking wherever possible the libertarian result. In one case this may require loose construction of a statute, in another strict construction. Take two illustrative cases. Federal legislation covering railroad injuries is hopelessly old-fashioned; railroads are liable only for accidental injuries to employees resulting from the "negligence" of other employees. The activist reaction is to bring the legislation up to date by broadly interpreting its standards. Thus a fireman who had contracted silicosis by breathing silica dust from sand that was used in locomotive sanding boxes alleged faultily to release excessive amounts of sand was held to have suffered an "injury" under the Federal Employers' Liability Act and an "accident" within the meaning of the Boiler Inspection Act.²⁰

Contrariwise, narrow construction was the libertarian reaction of Justice Black in United States v. Alpers,²¹ involving a conviction for shipping obscene phonograph records in interstate commerce. Black dissented from the conviction, because the statute covered shipment of obscene books, pamphlets, pictures, films, "or other matter of indecent character," but did not mention phonograph records specifically. "Censorship in any field may so readily encroach on constitutionally protected liberties that courts should not add to the list of items banned by Congress," he said.

Again, the libertarian activist's attitude toward procedural requirements varies according to the results achieved. Where procedure is a restraint on interference with liberties, it is welcomed and even treated as a constitutional requirement. Thus in Trupiano v. United States,²² the libertarian majority insisted that a search warrant was necessary to justify seizure of moonshining equipment, even though the operator of ¹⁹ This view was well stated by Justice Gibson in Eakin v. Raub (1825), where he argued that justices are in the situation of jurors in capital cases, who "do not deprive a prisoner of life by finding him guilty of a capital crime; [they] but pronounce his case to be within the law, and it is therefore those who declare the law . . . who deprive him of life." Quoted from R. E. Cushman, Leading Constitutional Decisions (8th ed., New York, 1946), p. 218.

the still was lawfully arrested in the midst of the implements of his crime. But Murphy, who wrote Trupiano, is also authority for the view that justices should cut through "formal concepts" if they stand in the way of a libertarian result. As he said in Carter v. Illinois:

Legal technicalities doubtless afford justification for our pretense of ignoring plain facts before us, facts upon which a man's very life or liberty conceivably could depend. . . . But the result certainly does not enhance the high traditions of the judicial process.²³

The Vinson Court's fifth libertarian, according to the evidence of Table I, is Justice Frankfurter. However, the substantially lesser degree of support for libertarian claims shown by his record indicates that he is either less libertarian, or less activist, or both, than the four justices who outrank him. There is a widespread impression that Frankfurter has not acted like a liberal on the Court. It derives from the position he has taken in such important controversies as the two flag salute cases,²⁴ the two sound truck cases,²⁵ Dennis v. United States,²⁶ Feiner v. New York,²⁷ International Brotherhood of Teamsters v. Hanke,²⁸ and numerous others.

It derives also from the bitter campaign he has waged against use of the clear and present danger test, with or without preferred position amplification, as a guide for judicial decisions in the civil liberties field. As the self-anointed disciple of Holmes on the Vinson Court, many have found it strange that he should so vehemently deny the utility of Holmes' principal contribution to free speech theory. His answer has been: (1) that the test was being used for a purpose other than Holmes intended—namely, to determine the constitutionality of legislation; (2) that it was being applied in much different areas than Holmes contemplated, including contempt of court proceedings, libel cases, and application of petty police regulations; and (3) that the spirit of its recent use was much different than Holmes would have approved.

On this latter point he said in Pennekamp v. Florida:

"Clear and present danger" was never used by Mr. Justice Holmes to express a technical legal doctrine or to convey a formula for adjudicating cases. It was a literary phrase not to be distorted by being taken from its context.

When viewed in context, he contended, the bias of the test was as much toward regulation as toward freedom:

²³ 329 U. S. 173 (1946). Italics added.

²⁷ 340 U. S. 315 (1951).

²⁸ 339 U. S. 470 (1950).

In its setting it served to indicate the importance of freedom of speech to a free society but also to emphasize that its exercise must be compatible with the preservation of other freedoms essential to a democracy and guaranteed by our Constitution.

Consequently he concluded in the Dennis case:

It were far better that the phrase be abandoned than that it be sounded once more to hide from the believers in an absolute right of free speech the plain fact that the interest in speech, profoundly important as it is, is no more conclusive in judicial review than other attributes of democracy or than a determination of the people's representatives that a measure is necessary to assure the safety of government itself.²⁹

These apparently anti-libertarian doctrines and results, however, can be explained on the basis of a libertarian theory—the theory that the primary responsibility of a liberal justice is to restrain the exercise of judicial power. This theory sees the Court not as crusader or advocate, but as one of the instruments of political and social accommodation and adjustment in a complicated governmental system. As opposed to the goal-orientation of the activists, this view might be called functionally-oriented. Its announced emphasis is not on securing a result conforming to the jurist's own scheme of values, but upon adherence to appropriate judicial standards and proper manipulation of judicial techniques.

Standards for determining the appropriateness of judicial reactions are derived from considerations of the position of an appellate court within the federal judicial system, and of the position of the entire judicial branch vis à vis the legislature and executive in a system based on the separation of powers. This point of view will be much concerned with fixing the boundaries of judicial power, and will conceive that it is the justice's primary responsibility to stay within the confines of those boundaries.

In application, this concern about judicial limitations has been responsible for strict construction of the Court's jurisdiction over "cases and controversies," for the doctrine of "political questions" which are immune to judicial review, for the various rules protecting acts of Congress from being declared unconstitutional, for the "reasonable man" theory of review of state legislation. Where the Court has in the past divided on application of these principles of judicial limitation, it has typically been the liberal justices who have stressed the necessity for judicial self-restraint, as opposed to the conservative practice of broad judicial review. It was a liberal minority which spoke through Justice Stone during the New Deal constitutional crisis with the now classic warning that "the only check upon our own exercise of power is our own sense of self-restraint."³⁰ And it was in Ashwander v. TVA that the liberal trio of Brandeis, Stone, and Cardozo reformulated the general principles of limited judicial review of constitutional questions.³¹

²⁹ As for the "preferred position" doctrine, in Kovacs v. Cooper he refers to it as "a phrase that has uncritically crept into some recent opinions of this Court. I deem it a mischievous phrase, if it carries the thought, which it may subtly imply, that any law touching communication is infected with presumptive invalidity . . . I say the phrase is mischievous because it radiates a constitutional doctrine without avowing it."

Frankfurter's attempts to apply these principles of libertarian restraint clearly account for many of the anti-libertarian results he has achieved. Because the Court is the least representative or democratically responsible of the three branches of government, he feels under great pressure to yield to both Congress and the executive.³² Examples of his deference to the President are found in the Hawaiian martial law case, where he objected to the Court's second-guessing, from the safe vantage point of 1946, military decisions made in 1941 and 1942;³³ and Ludecke v. Watkins, where he foreclosed judicial review of presidentially-approved deportations of alien enemies.³⁴ Comparable examples of deference to Congress are United States v. Lovett, where he denied that it is a bill of attainder when Congress forbids specific individuals from being paid out of an appropriation act,³⁵ and United States v. CIO, where he was part of a majority which avoided declaring part of the Taft-Hartley Act unconstitutional by holding that it must not mean what Taft had said it meant.³⁶

In the famous steel seizure case, Frankfurter was caught in the cross-fire between President and Congress, and could not be deferential to both. He chose Congress, but his opinion nonetheless gave respectful consideration to the case for the President, and he wound up with the suggestion that a very minor change in the presidential seizure formula might have legitimized the action.³⁷ In contrast, Black and Douglas, un-

³¹ 297 U. S. 288 (1936). Roberts also joined this trio.

³³ Duncan v. Kahanamoku, 327 U. S. 304 (1946).

³⁷ Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U. S. 579 (1952). Frankfurter said: "The judiciary may, as this case proves, have to intervene in determining where authority lies as between the democratic forces in our scheme of government. But in doing so we should be wary and humble. Such is the teaching of this Court's rôle in the history of the country." As to the change in formula, he wrote: "We must . . . put to one side consideration of what powers the President would have had . . . if the seizure had been only for a short, explicitly temporary period, to be determined automatically unless Congressional approval were given."

deterred by conceptions of self-restraint, dogmatically condemned the President's action on the basis of a rigorous and naive interpretation of separation of powers. Black disposed of the entire controversy in thirteen paragraphs, and on such a plane of lofty moral and constitutional generalities that he did not bother to cite a single Supreme Court decision bearing on the substantive issue.

The principle of federalism is another powerful restraining force for Frankfurter, with state legislatures and courts as the principal beneficiaries. In upholding the Illinois "group libel" law, he contended that state legislatures must have the power to pursue "trial-and-error" methods in seeking solutions for social problems.³⁸ In Colegrove v. Green he denied an appeal to the federal courts "to reconstruct the electoral process of Illinois."³⁹ In the Terminiello case he was appalled that a majority of his colleagues should have reversed a state conviction on a federal ground which the Supreme Court itself had discovered and which the parties had never presented.

This is a court of review, not a tribunal unbounded by rules. We do not sit like a kadi under a tree dispensing justice according to considerations of individual expediency.

In Uveges v. Pennsylvania a somewhat similar eagerness to find error in a state court's action led him to say: "After all, this is the Nation's ultimate judicial tribunal, not a super-legal-aid bureau."⁴⁰ And in the infamous case of Screws v. United States, where a Georgia sheriff had murdered a Negro he had under detention, Frankfurter dissented against application of a federal civil rights law to a "patently local crime."⁴¹

Thus Frankfurter seems to have worked out and applied a fairly consistent policy of self-restraint in civil liberties adjudication. But how do we know whether this is the reflection of genuine libertarian restraint, or merely convenient rationalization for a fundamentally anti-libertarian set of personal preferences? One way of throwing light on such a difficult motivational problem⁴² is to examine his voting reactions in situations where judicial restraint would not be required by his philosophy. Two of the four types of cases in Table I fall in this category—aliens and federal criminal prosecutions. Since both types involve federal action, there is no

³⁸ Beauharnais v. People, 343 U. S. 250 (1952).

⁴¹ 325 U. S. 91 (1945). In United States v. Williams, 341 U. S. 70 (1951), Frankfurter carried the majority with him in adopting a restrictive interpretation for a companion federal civil rights statute.

⁴² Another method, of course, is to review Frankfurter's record on civil liberties before he became a member of the Supreme Court.

problem of deference to states. Since the alien cases practically all turn on matters of statutory interpretation, there is no problem of restraint to avoid declarations of unconstitutionality. The federal prosecutions do raise constitutional issues, but in the form of practices in the lower federal courts, over which the Supreme Court has rather complete supervisory responsibilities. In both types of cases Frankfurter's record is positively libertarian—in alien cases more so than Douglas', in federal criminal prosecutions more so than Black's. Thus Frankfurter's motivation appears to be genuinely that of libertarian restraint.

The two schools of libertarian thought on the Vinson Court have in a substantial number of cases found common ground to stand on against the views of less libertarian members of the Court.⁴³ But in other respects their differences are great. The strength of libertarian activism is that of a dedicated idealism to the cause of liberty which holds fast against the most powerful pressures. No one should underestimate or undervalue the courage manifested by the Black and Douglas dissents in the Dennis case, or fail to appreciate the strength of their conviction that "right" will ultimately triumph. It is very useful and provocative to have the pure free speech doctrine defended in such an influential forum. No matter how much Frankfurter may scorn "preferred position" as a judicial tool, such talk unquestionably has an educational value for an unsophisticated public.

But libertarian activism has the defects of its virtues. A Supreme Court justice has a task which is broader than that of safeguarding or enforcing one set of values. He must balance the competing claims of liberty and authority. If he automatically takes the libertarian side on every issue, he is scarcely functioning in a balancing capacity. The preferred position philosophy is the activists' way of justifying, or even of requiring, this extra emphasis on libertarian values. Actually, the preferred position argument is not incompatible with the balancing process; its result is simply to throw an extra weight on one side of the scales, like the butcher who consistently weighs his thumb along with the meat.

What does seem incompatible with the balancing process is "label thinking," which makes use of absolutistic standards or fixed categories. For Black, prior restraint is prior restraint, and therefore unconstitutional, whether the restraint is aimed at Jehovah's Witnesses ringing doorbells or the gigantic conspiracy of the Communist party. It would seem preferable that the determining factor in a judgment of constitutionality should be, not the label by which the restraint is called, but the seriousness of the threat to freedom and the justification offered for the limitation.

Label thinking unfits a justice to make distinctions based on matters of degree, and results in the kind of absolutistic standards seen at work in Black's steel seizure decision. Label thinking leads a judge into a world of abstractions in which the facts of particular cases are unimportant, as Douglas demonstrated by his unrealistic approach to the Terminiello case. Label thinking encourages a justice to apply to a statute legal rather than empirical tests, as Murphy did when he declared an anti-picketing statute unconstitutional "on its face" in Thornhill v. Alabama. Considering the subsequent difficulties the Court has had with the Thornhill doctrine, it would have been preferable if Murphy had set the holding in a framework of circumstances rather than of concepts. Paul A. Freund makes this point well in comparing the Court's treatment of commerce and civil liberties questions:

A free market in ideas and a free national market in goods are basic processes in our constitutional system. Each must nevertheless submit to qualifications in collision with other public interests. If the Court has on the whole been more successful in finding serviceable accommodations under the Commerce Clause between a national free market and the claims of local welfare than under the First Amendment between liberty of the mind and the claims of public order, one reason may be the more empiric, particularistic approach that has generally characterized the performance of the former role.⁴

Frankfurter's consciously elaborated standard of judicial restraint raises problems of a different sort. He is clearly justified in wanting to develop and act on a sound, consistent philosophy of the judicial function in a democracy. But he has carried his preoccupation with restraint to almost pathological extremes in an effort to ensure and demonstrate that his own decisions are the product of legal principles operating under antiseptic conditions and untouched by personal preferences. In case after case he has prefaced his decision by a disquisition on the duality of Frankfurter the man and Frankfurter the judge. Mostly he has been concerned with showing why as a judge he has felt compelled to come to conclusions which as a citizen he would never support. Thus in the second flag salute case he explained his refusal to hold unconstitutional the compulsory flag salute in public schools as follows:

One who belongs to the most vilified and persecuted minority in history is not likely to be insensible to the freedoms guaranteed by our Constitution. Were my purely personal attitude relevant I should whole-heartedly associate myself with the general libertarian views in the Court's opinion, representing as they do the thought and action of a lifetime.⁴⁵

In Haley v. Ohio he referred to the fact that as a judge he could not give effect to his personal disbelief in capital punishment.⁴⁶ In the curious case of Louisiana v. Resweber, where a condemned man had failed to die in the electric chair because of its faulty mechanism, Frankfurter supplied the fifth vote for the Court's ruling that a second trip to the chair would not be double jeopardy or cruel and unusual punishment. He said:

I cannot rid myself of the conviction that were I to hold that Louisiana would transgress the Due Process Clause if the State were allowed, in the precise circumstances before us, to carry out the death sentence, I would be enforcing my private view rather than that consensus of society's opinion which, for purposes of due process, is the standard enjoined by the Constitution.⁴⁷

But how does Frankfurter propose to find standards which are external to his own value system? In the electric chair case, he professed to rely on "the consensus of society's opinion." But how did he know what the consensus of opinion was on a subject that had never arisen before? Instead of the result at which he arrived, could he not have assumed with equal validity that his own personal aversion to sending this man on a second trip to the electric chair was what any normally sensitive human being would have felt?

In the Haley case he went further, indicating that judicial humility, plus self-administered psychoanalysis, was the answer:

Humility in this context means an alert self-scrutiny so as to avoid infusing into the vagueness of a Constitutional command one's merely private notions. Like other mortals, judges, though unaware, may be in the grip of prepossessions. The only way to relax such a grip, the only way to avoid finding in the Constitution the personal bias one has placed in it, is to explore the influences that have shaped one's unanalyzed views in order to lay bare prepossessions.

These statements afford fascinating glimpses into a sophisticated judicial mind at work, but as public bulletins of successful inner purgation they carry a "holier than thou" inference with respect to disagreeing justices which seems quite unjustified. For Frankfurter's accounts certainly misstate or oversimplify the problem of judicial motivation. No matter how conscious or even heroic the efforts, the man and the judge can never be separated, and the gratifications of deprivation are as personally rooted as the gratifications of indulgence.

Frankfurter's major guides are negative in character—judicial self-restraint, deference to the legislature, the executive, and the states. But deciding Supreme Court cases is a positive job. There are responsibilities of judging which the Court cannot put off on a state court or a legislature. Frankfurter has on occasions come too close to abdicating this responsibility. Thus in the Feiner case he deferred to the New York Court of Appeals because it was an able and sensitive court. Application of this rule would give the preposterous situation of the Court's responsibility varying in different cases depending upon the reputation of the supreme court of the state from which the appeal came.

Both activism and restraint, then, have their limitations as working principles for libertarians on the Supreme Court. Neither emotional zeal which prejudges the issues, nor judicial neutralism which seeks ways of avoiding the substantive questions, will do. A Supreme Court justice must be able, and willing, to balance some of the most delicate, intangible, yet superlatively important issues that can arise in a democratic society. He must be a creature of the times and sensitive to the same currents of opinion as move legislators, to the end that the standards of reasonableness by which he judges legislative action will not be detached from reality. But he must at the same time be sensitive to the system of expectations which has made the Supreme Court the American conscience, with the responsibility, not merely of preaching to legislatures, but of passing judgment on their actions in the light of the great libertarian principles of the Bill of Rights.

THE TWO-PARTY SYSTEM IN BRITISH POLITICS

LESLIE LIPSON

University of California (Berkeley)

I

Britain may fairly be called the classic home of two-party government. This claim is justifiable because of some characteristics for which the system, as employed in Britain, is distinctive. Chief among these is its long duration. Although there is room for disagreement among historians about the time and circumstances of its birth, it would be difficult to deny that two-party government was established earlier, has lasted longer, and at the present time is probably more firmly rooted there than in any contemporary state. Indeed, the practice of simplifying the complexities of politics into a contest for office between a pair of major claimants has endured in Britain through a catalogue of changes which would assuredly have wrecked a less effective system. In that country it has survived the evolution from an oligarchy of aristocrats to a democracy of the whole people; the transfer of power from monarchy to parliament and then from parliament to cabinet; the rise of large-scale industry with its social aftermath; the switch in economic policy from mercantilism to laissez faire and from this to state planning; and withal, the expansion and subsequent shrinkage of Britain's international might.

Especially in recent decades, moreover, both major parties have developed a strength of organization and tightness of discipline, to which New Zealand offers the nearest parallel inside the British Commonwealth and no similar approximation exists outside. For this reason, Britain, whose two powerful parties differ so sharply from the plethora of groups in France, also stands in contrast to the United States. What we have in this country can more accurately be described as two party systems rather than a two-party system. In the election of Senators and Representatives and in the conduct of congressional business, the size and diversity of the United States have fostered a multiplicity of groups more akin to the politics of France than of Britain. Every four years, however, in order to capture the presidency, these groups amalgamate into two large and loose coalitions—like federal unions within a federal union. But even during a presidential election the cohesiveness of the Democrats and Republicans is far from matching that of the Conservatives and Laborites.

Many studies have been made of parties which examine their structure and organization, the interests they represent, and the programs they espouse. Also plentiful, because of the controversies surrounding proportional representation and because of the political experiences of various European nations, are discussions about the pros and cons of having two parties or many. Relatively less attention has been paid, however, to the problem of explaining why one or the other system emerges and survives and to that of detecting the circumstances which accompany and may cause the respective systems. With this problem, as it relates to Britain, the present article is concerned. It is written in the belief that a science of politics needs to devote more attention to the diagnosis of causation and that the comparative study of government can offer the best approach to its elucidation. The study of a single country, as is evident, can lead to conclusions which are valid for it alone and do not in themselves warrant a wider application. But such conclusions will suggest hypotheses for testing in other contexts, so that, when these are checked by a comparative method, a reliable body of argument can be pieced together.

The pitfalls on the way are, of course, many and deep. Frequently in efforts to analyze causal relationships there is much that consists of assertion rather than evidence; of assumed, instead of established, connections; and of effects mistaken for causes. Moreover, there is the danger in a complex situation of seeking the simple explanation of a single cause and believing one has found it. If these traps are successfully avoided, it should be possible to state, with more certainty than can be done at present, what conditions are responsible for the generation and operation of each type of party system; whether the causes that sustain it are identical with those from which it initially derived; whether similar factors, reproduced in like combination in different places, always yield the same results; and whether the same consequences may sometimes flow from dissimilar causes.

To avoid misunderstanding, a few preliminary clarifications are necessary, since discussion can otherwise be sidetracked and mired down in a semantic bog. A state has a two-party system if it satisfies the following conditions:

- (1) Not more than two parties at any given time have a genuine chance to gain power.

- (2) One of these is able to win the requisite majority and stay in office without help from a third party.

- (3) Over a number of decades two parties alternate in power.

Such a statement has the merit of being politically realistic. It recognizes that, even where two giant organizations dominate the political process, some Lilliputian groups may exist alongside of them. Only if one of the latter should succeed in holding the balance between the principal contenders does the two-party system cease, as is the case, for instance, in contemporary Australia. The list of conditions further permits the possibility that a major party may dwindle and decline and eventually be replaced by a newcomer, just as the British Laborites supplanted the Liberals. While this is happening, of course, a three-party system may emerge temporarily (witness Britain in the period from 1918 to 1931). It is also compatible with a two-party system for a major party to suffer a prolonged eclipse and be overshadowed by its rival in a series of elections, as the Whigs overwhelmed the Tories from 1714 to 1760 and the Liberals led the Conservatives between 1846 and 1874, and the Conservatives in their turn prevailed from 1886 to 1905. The presence within the system of minor parties which are unable to affect the control of power; a lengthy ascendancy of one party; even the extinction of a major party and the rise of a new one; these phenomena do not signify the abandonment of the two-party system provided that the previously stated conditions are fulfilled. What really matters is that over the long run government through two parties be clearly revealed as the norm, from which any departure is only temporary and to which the system always returns.¹ Judged by these criteria, Britain may be said to have operated the two-party system for two and a half centuries. Thus the long Whig ascendancy that began in 1714 did not prevent a Tory resurgence in 1760. Domestic conservatism during the Napoleonic period and immediately afterwards did not make impossible the Liberal-sponsored reforms of the 1830's. The Conservatives split in 1846 over the protection of home-grown wheat, but were reassembled by Disraeli so as to triumph in 1874. The Liberals were splintered in 1885-86, but came firmly into power in 1905-6. The Laborites were divided and routed in 1931, yet returned to sweep the country in 1945. A three-party system existed in the latter decades of the nineteenth century because of the Irish question and the talents of Parnell, and again in the 1920's when Laborites were rising and the Liberals were declining. But the two-party system reasserted itself after each of these seeming deviations.

Another problem, which is one of both definition and interpretation, concerns the meaning of the term "party." The statement made earlier that the two-party system in Britain is characterized chiefly by its longevity assumes that certain features persist continuously for centuries. But was there in fact anything in the politics of the eighteenth century that can properly be called "a party"? Is it perhaps a misnomer to use the same word to refer to the varied political associations that mark the eras of the Pelhams and the Pitts, of Grey and Peel, of Gladstone and Disraeli, of Asquith and Balfour, of Attlee and Churchill?

The truth is too plain to require argument that the lapse of more than two centuries has wrought changes that are substantial and profound. British politics a couple of hundred years ago were decidedly oligarchical and the government of those days was cast in a wholly aristocratic mold. After a hundred years had elapsed, the urban middle class had broken the earlier monopoly of aristocrats, but the majority of the public were still denied an influential voice in decisions that affected them. The principal differences between the older and more modern "parties" are to be found in the interests they represent and the structure of their organizations. The parties of today cohere together in a disciplined fashion which assuredly has no earlier parallel. Between them, their leadership and their followers include members of each class and of all the interests that comprise the national life. Such changes are, of course, explicable in terms of the fact which is fundamental to the politics of a fully developed democracy: the number who participate in its processes. When all adults have the right to vote, and eighty three or four per cent of them exercise it, as happened in the British elections of 1950 and 1951, the coalescing of millions and the harmonizing of their interests become the job of the political party.

But when all this is said, as say it we must, is the existence of parties before the modern era to be denied? No such conclusion is necessitated by the facts. The point that modern parties are greatly changed from their predecessors applies not only to them but to every institution of British government. The twentieth-century parliament, cabinet, monarchy, judiciary, civil service, and local authorities have all evolved into forms unlike what existed earlier. But though the cabinet under Churchill differs from its archetype under Walpole; though the figure-head monarchy of Elizabeth II is a far cry from the personal supremacy of Elizabeth I; though the Commons of Bevin and Bevan is many stages removed in functions, work-load, and membership from that of Pym and Hampden—nevertheless the identical terms are rightly used because of the unifying theme that has persisted throughout the variations. This may be done without abuse to language or to sense, provided that there be a substantial continuity of the institution concerned and reasonable comparability of the functions it performed then and performs now. Do the parties meet this test? In my judgment they do. Essentially a party is a group of people who are sufficiently likeminded to work together in order to secure control of the government and apply the policies that promote their interests. Within the breadth of that definition may be included a clique of aristocrats, an association of middle-class entrepreneurs, or a mass movement drawing millions to its banners. In that sense the label "party" can be applied alike to the gatherings that followed a Walpole, Peel, or Baldwin, for though these differed in the nature and number of their adherents, there is an unmistakable continuity that underlies the objectives they sought and the role they played.

II

Many reasons have been offered for the existence in British politics of two-party government. The various explanations are broadly of two kinds. Sometimes the system is interpreted as the outcome of specific institutions which supposedly lend themselves to the formation of two major parties and no more than two. Alternatively the roots of the two parties are traced to the foundations of British society and economics. Let us examine each of the suggested "causes" in turn.

The theories which seek to derive the two-party system from the structure of British political institutions have not failed to pay honorable mention to the cabinet. Indeed it was only to be expected that attempts to solve the riddle of the party system would connect it in some way with the cabinet, the latter being the key institution in British government. To assert, however, that a relation exists between factor A and factor B is one thing; to prove that in that relationship A is the cause, and B the effect, is quite another. This difficulty is well borne out by the course of the discussion over this very assumption that cabinet government caused two-party government. When A. Lawrence Lowell wrote his Governments and Parties in Continental Europe, he argued:

The result [so long as the ministers cling together] is that the members either group themselves about the ministers, and vote with them through thick and thin, or else they attach themselves to an opposition party, whose object is to turn out the cabinet, and then take office itself and carry on a different policy. The normal condition of the parliamentary system, therefore, among a people sufficiently free from prejudices to group themselves naturally, and possessing enough experience to know that the practical and attainable, and not the ideal, is the true aim in politics, is a division into two parties, each of which is ready to take office whenever the other loses its majority. . . .

A division into two parties is not only the normal result of the parliamentary system, but also an essential condition of its success.²

By the time that he published The Government of England, Lowell's position had shifted. He was still convinced that a causal connection existed between the cabinet and the party system. But he had now veered round to the view that, instead of the cabinet system causing the formation of two parties, it was the parties which preceded and caused the cabinet system, though he did think that the consequence had later reacted on its cause.

Neither the parliamentary system nor the party system, neither the responsibility of ministers to the House of Commons nor the permanent division into two parties, grew up in a day. Throughout the eighteenth century the principle of cabinet responsibility was but dimly recognised; while parties at times disintegrated, and the wheels of government were kept going by means of corruption, which has served in all ages as a lubricant for ill-adjusted political machinery. But little by little, with halting steps, the rivalry of parties built up the responsibility of ministers, and this in turn helped to perpetuate the party divisions; for the parliamentary system, like every rational form of government, reacts upon and strengthens the conditions of its own existence. It is based upon party, and by the law of its nature tends to accentuate party. . . . The parliamentary system, as it has grown up spontaneously in England, is in its origin and nature government by party, sanctioned and refined by custom.³

Lowell's afterthoughts were more accurate than his first impressions, for the notion that the two-party system is a by-product of the cabinet system encounters some fatal objections. There is, for example, the elementary chronological fact that the clustering of political factions into two major groups occurred at an earlier date than the emergence of the cabinet and thus could not have been caused by that institution. Like complex tapestries, the Whig and Tory combinations were woven of many strands, some of which connect directly with the Civil War between Parliamentarians and Royalists, while others may be more deviously and tenuously traced to the religious controversies of the sixteenth century or to earlier feuds among the nobility such as the Wars of the Roses. Certain it is, however, that after the last and most stupid Stuart was compelled to abdicate, the reigns of William and Mary and of Anne did witness the more orderly beginnings of bipolar politics with its essential corollary of alternation in office. For if it was the Whigs who understood Britain's interest in the War of the Spanish Succession, who pitted the nation's strength against the Sun-King, and who discovered the first genius with the surname Churchill, it was the Tories who divined when the time for peace had come and negotiated the Treaty of Utrecht.

The cabinet system, however, postdated these events. Its central principles—that the Crown should select as ministers only those who are supported by a parliamentary majority and that these should be collectively responsible for the acts of one and all—could be applied in practice only because the parties were already there to make them work. Indeed, as G. M. Trevelyan has observed, the party was the vital difference through which cabal was converted into cabinet.⁴ Add the fortunate accident of personality that a Walpole's talents were available to exercise among Englishmen the arts of leadership which a German-tongued Hanoverian prince could not, and thus the same party system which produced the ministry endowed it with its prime minister.

Comparative evidence presents another difficulty to adherents of the view that the cabinet produces two-party politics. Such evidence, it is true, must be cautiously employed, since it is impossible to prove by means of imported data that something must have, or could not have, happened in a particular country. Nevertheless, the fact remains that virtually all the countries of continental Europe which have adopted cabinet government also have multi-party systems. This suggests that the cabinet, per se, was not the prime cause of the party system in Britain, for, were that the case, it might reasonably be expected that when cabinets were installed elsewhere, they would give rise to the same consequences. Since the cabinet system, however, can be found associated in more cases with multi-party systems than with a two-party system, and since the latter instances occur only within the British Commonwealth, the existence of two parties would appear to be the product of other elements that are peculiar to the British tradition.

One such element, which some political scientists have proffered in argument, is the cabinet's use of the power to dissolve a parliament. How this is supposed to discourage the formation of more than two parties is thus explained by Harold F. Gosnell:

In Great Britain the two-party system is also perpetuated by the type of parliamentary government which the British have evolved. The Prime Minister can dissolve Parliament and declare new elections. This gives the party in power a firm grip over its members in the House of Commons, and discourages their trying any insurrections or new ventures, since re-election is a troublesome and uncertain matter. In doubtful British constituencies, winning an election is difficult, and the support of a major party is almost a necessity. The party in power keeps its members in the House from straying, and the opposition party is well disciplined because this is the only way that it can hope to come to power.⁵

The case is further buttressed by a reference to France, the classic example of multi-party politics. Because under the Third Republic the power to dissolve the Chamber of Deputies was used only once and then became obsolescent, people often assume that this fact helps to explain why the legislature, dominated by the cabinet in Britain, dominates over it in France. This line of reasoning scarcely supports the pretended conclusion, since it omits a number of considerations that point in another direction. The argument assumes that a ministry is better equipped to enforce party regularity among its followers in the Commons because it alone can take the initiative of deciding when to hold a general election and, if defeated in parliament, may prefer to go to the country rather than tamely resign. But precisely how this flexibility in the timing of elections strengthens the disciplinary control of the cabinet is not proven. Such a control does, of course, exist. But it rests primarily on other foundations: the cost of winning a general election; the centralization of party finances; the dependence of many members on their salaries; the power of the party leadership to endorse local candidates; and the absence of any requirement that a candidate must reside in his district, which makes him depend for his seat more on the leaders and less on his constituents. In the light of such potent considerations, it makes relatively little difference to most back-benchers whether a general election will be called this year, next year, or two years hence. At some time, as he well knows, the day of reckoning must come. Whenever it does, he depends for renomination on the favor of the leadership, and that dependence would still hold good in Britain even if elections were held there with the clock-work regularity of the American system.⁶

The point is clearly illustrated by the experience of the country whose politics approximate most nearly to the British model. New Zealand has a similar two-party pattern; both parties are well disciplined; and its cabinet, of the familiar British type, dominates the legislature. For six decades after 1889, however, the power of dissolution was never employed. Elections were regularly held every three years, save on three occasions when Parliament extended its own life. Even when the power of dissolution was resuscitated in 1951, the circumstances in no way involved the survival of the ministry, a split in the government party, or a parliamentary stalemate. A system of two tight-knit parties, therefore, does not depend upon a power to dissolve and the practice of having irregularly spaced elections.

Furthermore, if the power to dissolve were actually such a deterrent to party rebels as is believed, how does one explain the cases of defiant party members, and actual splits that have occurred? The ministerial power of dissolution did not deter Disraeli from rising against Peel in 1846, or Chamberlain and the Liberal Unionists from crossing over to the Conservatives in 1886, or Henderson and his cohorts from breaking with Macdonald in 1931. Indeed, there may even be occasions when a group of dissidents, so far from coming to heel, withdraw their support from ministers and deliberately provoke a dissolution in the hope that an election may work to their own advantage, as was clearly Parnell's stratagem when he switched from Gladstone to Salisbury in 1885.

Nor can French politics during the Third Republic be properly adduced as evidence that the absence of a power to dissolve modifies the character of the party system. That reasoning is fallacious because it takes for granted, instead of proving, the point which is really in issue. What has to be explained is why a power that was explicitly written into the Constitutional Law of February 25, 1875,⁷ and was employed as early as 1877, was never used again. The answer is, of course, that, owing to the politics of the Seize Mai affair, a trick which the monarchists had devised against the republicans recoiled upon the heads of its promoters, for it was the republicans who won the election which their rivals engineered. Henceforth the Right feared to risk a second attempt, so that even Doumergue failed to reactivate the power of dissolution in the early 1930's; and the Left were reluctant to invoke it, since they remembered 1877, and in any case they were unlikely to enlist the necessary consent of the conservatively-inclined Senate. But the implications of this truth have often been misunderstood. The truth is that the power to dissolve atrophied because the structure of the party system precluded the use of its potentialities. When there are many parties, and every government is a coalition, it is harder to reach agreement about the time to dissolve than when a single party takes the decision. It was the parties, in other words, that determined the use, or rather disuse, of the power to dissolve, and not the latter which determined the character of the parties. Possibly, moreover, although it is still too early to speak with assurance, the same will prove to be true of France's Fourth Republic. Whilst the Constitution of 1946 reincorporates a power of dissolution,⁸ the parties of the "Third Force" coalition, which could have staged the requisite crises ministérielles,⁹ and precipitated an election in 1948 or 1949, showed a marked reluctance to brandish a weapon which might be twisted from night-stick into boomerang.

Of all the attempts, however, to interpret the parties as the product of other political institutions, the most popular view attributes the existence of two parties to the operation of the electoral system. Perhaps no commonplace is so widely held, and so seldom questioned, among students of politics, as the notion that single-member districts combined with plurality victories foster a two-party system, with its corollary that proportional representation promotes a multiplicity of parties. Thus, in a recent work Robert G. Neumann categorically states: "The existence of a two-party system in Britain is an historical accident which has been preserved by the plurality system of elections and the single-member constituency."¹⁰ Similarly, but with more general application, V. O. Key has written:

Among the influences leading the electorate to divide itself into only two major groups, great weight must be attributed to the system of choosing representatives from single-member districts by a plurality vote in contrast with systems of proportional representation which, of necessity, are based on multi-member districts. In a single-member district only two parties can contend for electoral victory with any hope of success; a third party is doomed to perpetual defeat unless it can manage to absorb the following of one of the major parties and thereby become one of the two parties itself. Parties do not thrive on the certainty of defeat. Faced by this prospect the only alternative is to support one or the other of two parties. The single-member district thus molds parties into the bipartisan pattern.¹¹

How does this argument apply to the case of Britain? Does it fit the facts of that country's politics? There are some important respects in which it fails to do so.

In the first place, the effect of the plurality requirement has to be considered. If victory in the election required a majority of the votes cast, it is true that a two-party system would be more likely to arise, since groups would be encouraged to coalesce in order to build up the necessary strength.¹² But that is not the British system. On the contrary the mathematics of victory by a bare plurality would, if not counteracted by other influences, foster the politics of a multi-party system, because the larger groups could expect to win seats without entering into wider unions. As for the single-member districts, the proponents of the theory ignore the awkward truth that in Britain these postdated the rise of the two-party system. Prior to the Reform Act of 1832, the House of Commons contained a total of 558 members, of whom only 74 (13%) were returned from single-member districts.¹³ As a result of the redistributions of 1832, 1867, and 1885, districts with a single member were gradually substituted for those with two members. But it was not until 1885 that the former became the rule.¹⁴ From that date through 1952, eighteen elections have been conducted in this new style. What has been the effect of the change?

It is customary to point to the decline of the Liberals in the 1920's as definitive proof of the hypothesis that single-member districts, plus election by plurality, operate adversely upon the weaker or weakest group and thereby cause a two-party system. The argument owes much—too much indeed—to Ramsay Muir's Book of Lamentations, which has been uncritically accepted at its face value.¹⁵ Thus E. E. Schattschneider in his provocative study of American party politics allows himself to write:

Many other instances of the operation of the single-member district system could be found. Outside the United States the most conclusive demonstration is to be seen in the fate of the Liberal party in England under an analogous election system. Here was a party that had every advantage—money, prestige, able leadership, a glorious history, and a large body of devoted followers—yet it was strangled by the election system. The Liberal party had the great misfortune to become a third party, and once caught in this position, was destroyed by the statistical tendency of the single-member district system.¹⁶

To say that it was the electoral process which "strangled" or "destroyed" the Liberals is a gross exaggeration. Their demise was due primarily to other, and far weightier, factors operating quite independently of the method of apportionment and voting. One has only to study the history of the four decades from 1884 to 1924 to see what these factors were. The Liberals declined as a party because the British economy and social order were overcome by cumulative changes for which neither their philosophy nor the combination of interests they had erstwhile represented permitted a solution. The swing of manufacturers from free trade to protection, because they suffered increasingly from German and other competition; the pressure of the newly enfranchised masses for social services and further regulation of business; the consequent need to substitute a positive program of governmental action for the negativism of laissez faire; the task of governing an Empire (and especially Ireland) which gave no qualms to Conservatives, but did give to Liberals a sense of guilt; the impact of World War I and the experience of a coalition in which some Conservatives were liberalized, but rather more Liberals were conservatized; and finally the sorry spectacle of discordant leaders squabbling among themselves and hence splitting their followers: these were the long and short term causes of the Liberal debacle. As compared with them, the electoral machinery per se had no more weight than the proverbial last straw. The Liberals, like the camel's back, could not have been broken without the accumulation of the innumerable and much weightier straws preceding the last.

But in any case, to use the decline of the Liberals as "proof" that Britain's electoral system perpetuates its two parties by driving the minor groups to the wall fails to explain how Labor ever succeeded in getting their start and becoming a major party. Thus Schattschneider, who contends that "the American two-party system is the direct consequence of the American election system,"¹⁷ also emphasizes that "no minor party in American history has ever become a major party, and no major party has ever become a minor party."¹⁸ This is not true at all, however, of Britain. The "statistical tendency" of the electoral system, which is alleged to have strangled the Liberals in their old age, ought to have suffocated the Laborites in their cradle. Why did this not happen? From 1900 through 1910, Labor won a smaller percentage of seats than the percentage of their votes—the fate that befell the Liberals in the twenties. Yet the one party surmounted this handicap, while the other did not. Does it not appear then that the causal significance of the electoral system has been greatly overrated?

Nor is the British experience an isolated one. Again it is New Zealand which offers a combination of factors precisely parallel to Britain. There too, with the same electoral machinery, the formerly potent Liberals dwindled and died between 1908 and 1931 and Labor supplanted them. So far from Labor's development being arrested by the mathematics of single-member districts, the New Zealand Liberals were not even able, while they still possessed a majority, to stem the oncoming tide by altering the electoral law to suit themselves. At the elections of 1908 and 1911 they employed the second ballot, with the provision that the only contestants at the "run-off" could be the two candidates who were placed highest at the first election. This made not the slightest difference, however, to the rise of the one party and the fall of the other—a process that was due to causes quite unconnected with the electoral system.¹⁹

The thesis that the nature of the electoral system determines the character of the party system runs into still more difficulties when France is brought into the discussion. If single-member districts plus plurality victories are supposed to create two parties, how did the multi-party system persist so obstinately in France even though scrutin d'arrondissement was adopted there in 1927? This question is a clear example of a non-existent difficulty which has been conjured up only because the argument of which it is a part begins with an incorrect premise and thence proceeds to a false conclusion. Consider the logic of the following syllogism. The major premise is the proposition that the party system is determined by the electoral system. There follows the minor premise that two parties are the product of single member districts. These errors are then compounded by a fallacious conversion, and it is assumed that where single member districts are established, two parties must ensue as a consequence. In France, however, the multi-party system maintained itself as tenaciously as ever. How is this undeniable fact explained away in order that the theory may be saved? The answer is that the theory's proponents refer to the system of ballottage (i.e., run-off elections) and point out that the second contest was normally confined to only two or three candidates, "which," writes V. O. Key, "approached the bi-partisan form."²⁰ They approached it in truth about as closely as many golfers approach the green on their second shot! The withdrawal of forlorn candidates after the first election; the negotiation of deals with the leading candidates; a network of temporary mariages de convenance in critical districts—all this was still a far remove from the essentials of two-party politics. Moreover, although within many constituencies the electorate fell into two or three groups on the second ballot, throughout the whole of France more than three such groups were formed, so that nationally the Chamber of Deputies continued to be split many ways.

¹⁹ For details about the effect of the second ballot in New Zealand, see my Politics of Equality (Chicago, 1948), pp. 190–91.

The French case, however, cannot be judged in its proper perspective unless all the electoral vicissitudes of the Third Republic (and not merely its last experiment) are considered together. Actually the Third Republic opened with single-member districts (1876–85), then switched to the list system (1885–89), returned again to single-member districts with plurality elections (1889–1918), swung over to scrutin de liste along with preferential voting (1919–27) and finally in 1927 reverted to single-member districts plus ballottage. During the entire period 1875–1940, therefore, more elections were fought under the single-member district plan than under proportional representation. But the point to be noted is that the overall character of the party system remained the same despite these oscillations from one method of voting to another. Surely this must indicate that the electoral system could have had only a slight effect, if indeed any, upon the party system. Otherwise one would expect to find some changes in the structure of parties, with alternate increase and decrease in their number corresponding to and consequent upon the electoral changes. That these cannot be detected should have served as a warning that the major premise of the theory examined above and the minor one are both at fault. That party systems are in some way related to systems of voting appears true. But which is the cause, and which is the effect? Students of comparative government would do well to reverse their initial hypothesis and then review the facts in a new light. There is, in my judgment, at least as much evidence to show that the parties are the prime determinants of the electoral system as that the latter determines the parties. In other words, to say that as go the parties, so goes the electoral system, may be as true as or truer than the converse. The predominant parties, whether two or more, select the brand of apportionment and voting procedure which they think will work to their best advantage. While it is then true that electoral mechanics serve to reinforce the parties—acting as a buttress, however, rather than as a foundation wall—the party structure continues thereafter to shape the operation and results of the electoral process to a greater extent than the latter is able to mold the parties.

The preceding discussion contains a clear implication: namely, that the character of the party system depends on and derives from factors more fundamental than the structure of political institutions. To understand these factors one must turn to the society within which the parties have their roots and grow. A political party is a collection of individuals clustering around an interest whose furtherance they make an issue and whose value they generalize into an ideal. Anything about which men cohere and feel deeply may become the basis for political activity and conflict. Interests may be simple or complex and their adherents more or less numerous. People may group and regroup in several combinations whose membership is not identical. Hence the party structure takes its substance from the interests which men engender in society and its form from the relations that are organized between them. This poses the question: what sort of divisions can be found in British society which provide the basis for partisan opposition? If sectional, cultural, religious, or economic cleavages occur, how have these been represented by the parties?

It is an arguable hypothesis that the two-party system emerged in Britain because the social order of that country was relatively homogeneous and offered little possibility for a multiple splintering of parties. This is to say that in a number of matters which are fundamental to society such a preponderant majority existed on one side of the question that the arena of practicable controversy was much restricted, and conversely the remaining issues on which two sides were opposed in nearly equal strength were few and the divisions between them fairly simple. Thus, if the small territorial expanse of the British Isles precluded the formation of sectional groups, the numerical superiority of Anglo-Saxons and Protestants prevented the rise of a Celtic or Catholic party. Likewise the dominance of agriculture until the end of the eighteenth century, and of urbanism since the middle of the nineteenth, clarified the battle-lines of economic conflict since it was impossible in the earlier period to dedicate a party wholly to the interests of city-folk, or more recently to those of farmers.

These generalizations are true in the main, but they need to be explained and in certain particulars qualified or corrected. Take, for example, the question of sectional influences on British party organization. It is, of course, doubtful whether parties are ever founded anywhere on a purely sectional base. Even in states that cover a huge area a section acquires much of its political relevance from other factors which happen to be reinforced by geographical concentration. Certainly in a country whose total area slightly exceeds that of Oregon, and where even the hillier terrain does not approach the contours of a Switzerland, there is less occasion for that sense of a separate political identity which physical remoteness can at least abet or aggravate. To the extent that sectional forces have obtruded into British politics, they have done so because they largely coincided with the boundaries of cultural and religious diversity and represented a genuine economic antagonism. The one clear instance of a party confined to a single section where it predominated is that of the Irish Nationalists. In nine successive elections from 1885 to 1918 their parliamentary seats showed a small variation between a high of 86 and a low of 80. The decision to form a separate bloc, instead of working inside one of the major parties, was based on Parnell's calculation that he could hold the balance between the Liberals and the Conservatives and disrupt the United Kingdom by obstructing its parliament. Theirs, however, was a solitary and special case and serves as the exception to point the rule. Stemming from cultural, religious, and economic differences, the ardent nationalism of the Irish was fostered by the existence of a water barrier and by embittered memories of past warfare. But the significance of the religious cleavage in this whole complex can be gauged by the fact that Ireland ceased to be politically solid in the counties of the north-east where Protestantism was strong and the opponents of Home Rule voted Conservative.²¹

The contrast between Ireland, on the one hand, and Scotland and Wales, on the other, is instructive. The two latter communities, though both belonging to the "Celtic fringe"²² and maintaining their own brands of nationalism, did not develop a separate Welsh or Scottish party. Why was this? One may suggest that a hilly border has produced among Scots and Welshmen less of an isolationist psychology than a sea channel can do; that their economic grievances were less acutely felt than those of the Irish; and that the divisions between Protestant churches were more easily bridged than the gulf between Protestant and Catholic. Instead of creating sectional parties, the Scots and Welsh have preferred to pursue their objectives within the fold of one or other of the two major organizations. The commonly accepted generalization assigns the Celtic areas to the Liberals at least during the nineteenth century, which was true in the main, though Disraeli was able to make inroads on the Liberal strength at the time of the Conservative victory of 1874. But the generalization does not apply to Scotland in the eighteenth century, and, of course, has little force today. In the first half of the eighteenth century Scotland had a politically split personality. Its Jacobite sympathies endowed it with Tory leanings; while those who were antagonized by the Stuart preference for Catholicism sided with the Whigs. Later in the same century the talents of Dundas and his skillful use of jobbery consolidated the Scottish votes into a solid Tory bloc, which was placed—for a price—at the disposal of Tory ministries. The Liberal decline in the twentieth century has proceeded more slowly in Scotland than in England, and still more slowly in Wales than in Scotland. What little is left of the Liberal organization nowadays might be called the last protest of the Celt against the Anglo-Saxon. Those Celtic constituencies where it formerly dominated have been partitioned between Labor and the Conservatives. To the former have gone the Welsh coal-mining areas and most of the "industrial waist" of Scotland; to the latter, the Scottish counties.

Sectional and cultural differences have had less effect on the general development of the British party system than religious dissension. Not only the origins of the Whig and Tory parties in the years from 1660 to 1700,²³ but their continued rivalry in the following century and the subsequent opposition of Conservative to Liberal, would be inexplicable unless viewed in the light of those religious controversies that have plagued the country since the reign of Henry VIII. But how did this issue contribute to the growth of a two-party system? On this point Carl J. Friedrich has commented: "England escaped the religious division (and the consequent development of a Catholic party) on account of the overwhelmingly Protestant nature of the country, buttressing this religious uniformity by depriving Catholics and other religious dissenters (nonconformists) of political privileges until well into the nineteenth century."²⁴ That is a curious statement because it both explains too little and implies too much. If being "overwhelmingly Protestant" means having "religious uniformity," why did some Protestants think it necessary to deprive others of "political privileges"? What "political privileges" were these, and, if uniformity was so securely "buttressed," did the relations between churches cease to be relevant to the strife between parties? Finally, by the same logic, why did the overwhelmingly Catholic character of France or Belgium not promote a two-party system in either of those countries?

The fact is that in the seventeenth century the kingdom was split by religion into three segments. In the middle stood the adherents of the Church of England, who were flanked on one side by the large group of Puritans and on the other by the smaller Catholic group. When the monarchy was restored in 1660, the Anglicans turned the tables on the Puritans, who had predominated in the Cromwellian decade, and wrote their triumph into the Clarendon Code. Though subsequently challenged, the central principles of that Code continued in force and formed the line of demarcation between those Protestants whose church was established and those whose churches were not. The threat of a Catholic revival under James II temporarily solidified the Protestant ranks. But when their victory was assured in 1688, the old cleavage re-emerged. In essentials the politics of the revolutionary settlement amounted to a deal between the two major factions. Parliamentary supremacy was accomplished by the Whigs, Anglican supremacy by the Tories. Neither party was wholly satisfied with this modus vivendi. Both, therefore, strove to undo that portion of it which favored their rivals. But the balance of forces was so nearly equal that two generations had to elapse before the agreement could be fundamentally amended. With George III on the throne the Tories assisted in the recrudescence of monarchical power. Owing to the debacle of the monarch's American policy, however, and his later fits of insanity, the principle of parliamentary authority was rammed down their throats.

To secure a Tory acceptance of religious toleration took longer. Throughout the entire eighteenth century and the first two decades of the nineteenth, the Tories were identified with the Church of England and championed its establishment. The Whigs were thus cast in the role of representing the Protestant nonconformists, whose numbers were notably swelled by the impact of the one great spiritual force that appeared in eighteenth century Britain—to wit, John Wesley. The political disabilities of the nonconformists were not total, however, and their influence was far from negligible. The intent of the Test and Corporation Acts was to debar dissenters from holding public office. But by no statute were they disfranchised. Still less were they prevented from giving financial assistance to the Whigs. Even the ban on their taking office was not rigorously enforced, and regularly after 1727 an annual Indemnity Act was passed by Parliament to exempt from legal penalties those office holders who did not swear the necessary oaths. The truth is, therefore, that eighteenth century Britain contained not religious uniformity, but religious dualism; and this was carried over directly into a two-party system. Nobody has expressed this with greater clarity than G. M. Trevelyan in the following passage:

... From the Restoration to the latter years of the nineteenth century, the continuity of the two parties in English politics was very largely due to the two-party system in religious observance, popularly known as Church and Chapel. . . . The dualism of the English religious world, and the disabilities imposed on Dissenters, form a large part of the explanation of the peculiarly English phenomenon of two continuous political parties in every shire and town of the land, surviving even when obvious political issues seem asleep or settled, or when the party programmes seem in certain important respects to have changed hands. . . . The dualism in the religious life of the nation reflected itself in a political dualism.²⁵

Because this political inequality survived on the statute-book for over a century and a quarter, the time-hardened pattern of a Tory affinity for the Anglicans and a Whig alliance with nonconformists continued to exist long after the decade of the 1820's when the disabilities of the latter and of the Catholics were at last removed. Even in modern times, therefore, it has made some sense to generalize about the church-frequenting Conservative and the chapel-going Liberal or Laborite.

How was this split over a religious issue connected with conflicts of economic interest? Or, to put the question another way, what "durable source of factions" was present in the sphere of economics which could give rise to partisan opposition, and especially to a division into two parties and not more?

Until the end of the eighteenth century British society was primarily rural and the farming interest predominated in the economy. The commercial interest, though far from negligible, was secondary. Under such circumstances party opposition admitted only one possibility. The landowning aristocracy divided into a majority who formed the Tories and a minority who united with the commercial interest to constitute the Whigs. Since the country squires were mostly Anglican, while the leaders of commerce were largely nonconformist, the religious split complemented the economic—a fact that contributed materially to a two-party system. Thus founded and fortified, the system had more than a century in which to settle down before encountering its severest test—the impact of rapid technological changes on the economic and social order. The cumulative effect of such changes has been to substitute an overwhelmingly urban society for one that was rural and to make farming yield pride of place to industry.²⁶ How did the parties adapt themselves to so major a transformation? Were the old bottles able to hold the new contents?

The answer is that the system, though subjected to an agony that was acute and prolonged, did in the end survive the strain. But during the course of readjustment, both great parties were respectively the victims of a major shock, whose results crippled one patient for thirty years and killed off the other. The first of these crises occurred when the manufacturing interest had grown to such proportions that it could challenge the farming interest and assert its predominance by altering to its advantage institutions which formerly favored the owners of land. That was done in the political reform of 1832, amending the franchise and the apportionment of seats in the Commons, and in the ensuing economic reform of 1846, which abolished the protective tariff on food. The immediate sufferer was the Conservative party, which cracked under the blow. The Peelites, including Gladstone, separated off and within a few years coalesced with the Liberals. The Conservative residue followed Disraeli. He, having correctly prophesied the permanent decline of British agriculture and knowing that a party devoted to a minority interest could not win majorities, looked around for a new source from which to replenish its strength—a task that occupied three decades.

At the very time that the Conservatives were emerging with renewed vitality, the crisis of the Liberals was beginning; for the same causes that helped the former harmed the latter. The contest between manufacturers and farmers amounted to a vertical division in the British economy wherein industrial wealth was arrayed against landed wealth. But with industrial predominance secured, a horizontal fissure soon opened in urban politics and poverty now challenged riches along class lines. The factory workers, in order to obtain improvements in their living and working conditions, besought the same voting rights that their Liberal employers had gained in 1832. On this issue there occurred in 1866 the first of the splits that were to prove fatal to Liberalism, since many a manufacturer was unwilling to see his employees enfranchised. When the suffrage was extended in 1867, the statute was enacted by a coalition of the minority Conservatives and the progressive wing of the Liberals. To whom would the huge new labor vote be given? For several decades it was actually divided between the two parties, since some working men voted for the Liberals as champions of nonconformists and social progress, while others were attracted to the benevolent paternalism of Disraeli's "Tory democracy" and to the hope of an imperial market for their products. Gradually, however, as the Liberal party weakened after a further split on the Irish question, and as tariff-conscious manufacturers drifted over into the Conservative camp, more Laborites began to whisper: "A plague on both your houses." The birth of a separate Labor organization ushered in temporarily a three-party system which lasted until, and ended with, the depression of the early nineteen-thirties. Even as they broke asunder, however, the Liberals continued to serve their country well, for, by entering the other parties, they made reform more palatable to the Conservatives and the constitution more palatable to Labor.

Throughout this entire process, the timing and the order of events have evidently been crucial to the retention of a two-party system. Its early development, as Friedrich has stressed,²⁷ gave the system an initial advantage, and it was particularly fortunate that the main outlines of the constitutional system were already settled before the social order was convulsed by industrialism. But there is another important aspect of the timing which has received insufficient emphasis. What distinguishes Britain's political history in the nineteenth century is the gradualism whereby the franchise was extended to successive waves of new voters. The great reform acts were spaced at such intervals—1832, 1867, 1884—that the two-party system, already established prior to the first reform, was able to guide, absorb and assimilate the additions to the electorate. Each new interest, as its members received the suffrage, was thus mobilized by and embraced within the system. Every extension of voting rights stimulated more intensive organization by the parties in order that the recently enfranchised might be registered and captured, and better organization reacted upon the parties and fortified them. For purposes of contrast the experience of France is illuminating. That country went to the limit and adopted adult male suffrage in 1848—prematurely, as the result showed, since Napoleon III's coup shortly followed. The same broad franchise was reintroduced at the birth of the Third Republic, and with it simultaneously appeared the multi-party system which reflected the diversity and conflict of interests in French society. British gradualism in this respect was better adapted to the rise and retention of a two-party system than French universalism.

²⁷ Op. cit., p. 413.

If this survey of the causes of the two-party system in Britain warrants any general hypothesis, it is that parties appear primarily to be the product of their society and are only secondarily the offshoot of governmental institutions. Though the latter are not without influence upon the party structure, they serve mainly to brace and bolster a system whose foundations are deeply embedded in and shaped by the cultural, religious, and economic components of a nation. Moreover, before wider application can be given to evidence drawn from a single country, allowance must be made for any unique elements in its history, which in the case of Britain are certainly the timing sequence and the rate of political adjustment to socio-economic upheaval. Finally, this last word of caution must be offered to those who would diagnose causation: to have shown what caused a certain party system in a given country is not to demonstrate that these causes, and only these, are necessary to produce it in any and every country.

POLITICAL ISSUES AND THE VOTE: NOVEMBER, 1952

ANGUS CAMPBELL, GERALD GURIN AND WARREN E. MILLER
University of Michigan

In March, 1952 the Carnegie Corporation made available to the Social Science Research Council a research grant to support a major study of factors influencing the popular vote in the 1952 presidential election. Under the sponsorship of the Council's Committee on Political Behavior¹ this project is currently being carried out by the Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan.

The study was developed around six major objectives:

1. To identify the voters and non-voters, Republicans and Democrats, within four major geographical areas, in regard to
 - a. socio-economic characteristics;
 - b. attitudes and opinions on political issues;
 - c. perceptions of the parties and the candidates.
2. To compare these groups to the corresponding groups in the 1948 presidential election.
3. To trace the resolution of the vote with particular attention to the undecided and changing voters.
4. To study the impact of the activities of the major parties on the population.
5. To analyze the nature and correlates of political party identification.
6. To analyze the nature and correlates of political participation.

Data designed to meet these objectives were gathered by means of nationwide sample surveys conducted in October and November, 1952. Two thousand and twenty-one persons, chosen by methods of probability sampling to represent all citizens of voting age living in private households in the United States, were interviewed by the Survey Research Center field staff shortly before the election; 1614 of these people were interviewed again shortly after the election.² The data of the present article are all based on the sample of 1614 people who were interviewed both before and after the election.

It is apparent that the full analysis of the data of this study will require many months. No major publication from the project is expected before 1954. However, because of the unusual interest in the study, it has seemed desirable to prepare one segment of the data for publication at the earliest possible date in order to acquaint students of political behavior with the nature of the project and of the kinds of analysis which are being carried out. The present article was prepared with this purpose in view.

¹ The members of the SSRC Committee on Political Behavior are V. O. Key (chairman), Conrad M. Arensberg, Angus Campbell, Alfred de Grazia, Oliver Garceau, Avery Leiserson, M. Brewster Smith, and David B. Truman. The Committee is in no way responsible for the present article.

² Two hundred and twenty-two of the original 2021 respondents, who constituted an extra loading of the sample in the Far West, were dropped from the November sample. An additional 185 respondents could not be reinterviewed. Statements of the sample design and sampling errors and copies of the questionnaires may be obtained from the Survey Research Center upon request.

THE OBJECTIVES

Studies of political behavior and particularly sample surveys related to voting behavior have demonstrated that during recent years the followers of the two major political parties have differed substantially in their views on the pressing issues of the day.³ In 1948, for example, the amendment of the Taft-Hartley Labor Act became an issue of such heat that it divided Republican and Democratic voters almost as clearly as the question as to who was to become president. It has recently been proposed that party identification and attitudes on partisan issues may exercise reciprocal relationships producing uniformity among party followers, some identifying with the party because of its stand on issues, others adopting positions on issues in order to conform to party position.⁴

The major purpose of the present article is to make available new data concerning the role of political issues in a presidential election campaign. Although a short appendix presents data showing the voting records of the major demographic groupings in the 1948 and 1952 elections, the primary intent of the article is to carry further than has hitherto been possible the analysis of the relationship of the voter's attitudes on partisan issues to his actual vote.

Limitations of space and the preliminary state of our analysis preclude any exhaustive treatment of the relation of issues to voting behavior in the recent election. We will concentrate, therefore, on two of the most striking characteristics of the 1952 vote—the unusually large turnout, and the shift to the Republicans after a generation of Democratic rule—and attempt to show how these phenomena were related to the issues covered in this study. The first two sections of this article, therefore, will be mainly concerned with the following two questions:

How were issues related to the movement of citizens from the passivity of non-voting into the act of voting in the 1952 presidential election?

How were issues related to changes in voting behavior whereby blocs of voters were lost by one party and gained by another party?

In addition to the study of campaign issues, another familiar method of analyzing the presidential vote has been through comparison of the voting records of various easily defined sub-groupings of the national electorate. Past research has corroborated common-sense impressions that, during the last twenty years, there has been a tendency for labor union members, college educated people, residents of large cities, farmers, Catholics, Southerners and members of other such social classifications to cast their votes rather predominantly for one or the other party. This has in fact led to the proposition put forward by Lazarsfeld and his associates that voting may be largely understood as an expression of the individual's conformance to his basic sociological environment.⁵

Although these relationships between socio-economic groupings and the vote have usually been considered separately from the relationships between campaign issues and the vote, the two analytic approaches overlap in many ways. As politicians have recognized in shifting their arguments to suit their audience, many issues have differential meaning and importance for different segments of the population. An analysis which systematically examines the differential relation between issues and the vote in different sub-groupings of the national electorate should provide added insight both into the meaning of the issues and the reasons for intergroup voting differences. Although such a systematic analysis is beyond the scope of the present report, some preliminary data bearing on this problem will be presented. The third section of this report will be mainly concerned with the following question:

Were the relationships between specified issues and voting behavior in the 1952 election essentially the same for all major sections of the electorate or were there important differences between people in different socio-economic groupings?

THE DATA

A full investigation of public attitudes on the political issues of the 1952 campaign would have required a very extensive interview devoted entirely to this objective. Because of the pressure of other interests it was decided to restrict this aspect of the present study to seven questions, three relating to domestic issues and four to foreign policy issues.⁶ They were asked as part of the pre-election interview. These questions were chosen on an a priori basis as representing areas of relatively clear party difference and covering a broad range of governmental activities.

A major characteristic of the items is that they are all issues on which the Truman Administration accepted responsibility for a particular position. Adherence to this criterion means, of course, that these particular questions cannot be thought of as a representative sample of all the questions which might have been asked concerning the issues of the campaign. It will be noted, for example, that no inquiries were made regarding "corruption" or "communism in government" although these accusations were prominently featured in the oratory of the campaign.⁷ The questions were selected with the following broad considerations in mind: The issues should encompass fundamental, long term party differences (e.g., governmental social welfare activity, U. S. foreign in-vovement), they should tap both ideological orientations and the less sophisticated "bread and butter" reactions (e.g., Taft-Hartley, FEPC, U. S. entry in the Korean war), and they should provide information on recent partisan controversies (e.g., U. S. China policy, current U. S. Korean policy).

It is possible that a different choice of questions might have yielded results different from those which are presented here. However, the questions which were used were chosen because they bore on issues which appeared to be of major significance and it is not probable that other questions bearing on these same issues would have yielded substantially different results.

Each of the seven questions was scored as to whether the respondent expressed an opinion supporting the policy of the Truman Administration or opposing it. For each question there were some respondents who did not offer a clearly pro- or anti-Democratic opinion, either because they knew nothing about the question (as in the case of the Taft-Hartley Act) or because they did not hold any clearly partisan position regarding it. In the presentations which follow, the proportions of supporting, opposing and neutral-uncertain responses total to 100 per cent for each of the groupings which is being represented. For the convenience of the reader, an Index of Partisanship is also included. This is obtained by subtracting the proportion of responses opposing the Democratic position from the proportion supporting it.

Each of the respondents was asked in the November interview how he had voted on November 4th. Seventy-four per cent of the sample said they had voted.⁸ The two-party division of their two-party vote was 58 per cent for Eisenhower and 42 per cent for Stevenson, indicating a slight bias in favor of Eisenhower but well within the sampling error of the survey. When the opinions of these Democratic and Republican voters on the seven issues are compared it is possible to see the extent to which these particular questions divided the followers of the two parties (Table I).

The absolute values which are presented in this and the following tables are much less important for the present analysis than the relation of these values to each other. The significant conclusion to be drawn from Table I is the fact that on all of the seven questions Democrats and Republicans, taken as total groups, differ in their opinions and differ in the direction of their party position. Throughout the seven issues one finds more Democratic than Republican voters supporting Democratic policies. On four of the items there is both a preponderance of Democratic support for Democratic policies and, at the same time, a comparable balance of Republican opposition to the same policies.

It will be noted that the issue of FEPC was least discriminative of all the seven issues in separating Democratic and Republican voters. Attitudes on this issue are also found to have markedly different relationships to voting patterns than do attitudes on the other six issues. Because of the unique character of this issue, possibly resulting from its strong racial and regional components, it is not included in the analysis which follows. A detailed statement of the interrelations of all the issues studied will be presented in a subsequent report.

Republican voters—687

The respondents of the survey were not only asked their 1952 vote; they were also asked how they voted in 1948.³ When these two reports are combined for each respondent it is possible to subdivide the sample into politically meaningful groupings which have more analytical interest than the sample taken as a whole. The discussion which follows deals with five such groups:

The regular voters.

1. The regular Democrats, people who voted for the Democratic presidential nominee in both the 1948 and 1952 elections, hereafter referred to as DD's (362 cases).
2. The regular Republicans, people who voted for the Republican nominee in both 1948 and 1952, hereafter referred to as RR's (385 cases).

³ The authors are aware of the dangers of error in recalling a vote cast four years previously. Examination of the data on the reported 1948 votes shows evidence of some random error in report, but no serious systematic error. The question on 1948 vote was asked in the pre-election interview.

The new voters.

3. The new Democrats, people who did not vote in 1948, either because of age or other reasons, but who voted Democratic in 1952, hereafter referred to as ND's (104 cases).

4. The new Republicans, people who did not vote in 1948 but voted Republican in 1952, hereafter referred to as NR's (125 cases).

The switching voters.

5. The Democrats turned Republican, people who had voted Democratic in 1948 but who voted Republican in 1952, hereafter referred to as DR's (165 cases).¹⁰

I. THE NEW VOTERS

The data of the survey show that those voters of 1952 who were non-voters in 1948 were composed, about one to three, of young people eligible to vote for the first time and older people who, for one reason and another, had not voted in the 1948 election. Both classes of new voters voted in very nearly the same proportions as did the rest of the population, the young people giving General Eisenhower a 57-43 majority of their two-party vote, and their older counterparts voting 53-47 for Republican electors. Inasmuch as the divisions within these two groups were not significantly different from the division within the rest of the population, it is apparent that, given no other changes, the elimination of the 1948 non-voters from the 1952 electorate would not have altered the proportionate distribution of the popular vote.

The fact that both these classes of new voters followed the national trend very closely in their choice of candidates indicates that they were not activated into the role of voters by any common point of view regarding current issues. On the contrary, it would appear that the ND's and the NR's must have differed about as much in their perceptions and attitudes as did the rest of the voters.

In order to reveal the possible relationships which may have existed in these groups between positions taken on the issues with which this study deals and preferences for one or the other candidate, it is necessary to compare the opinions expressed by the ND's and the NR's in answer to the different questions asked. This is done in Table II, which also includes the responses given by the "regular" voters, DD's and RR's.

An overall inspection of this table makes apparent a clear polarity in partisan attitudes on each question, with a strong tendency toward a pro-Democratic position among the DD's and an anti-Democratic position among the RR's. The ND's tend to resemble the DD's and the NR's to resemble the RR's.

It will be noted that the ND's are more consistently similar to their DD associates than the NR's are to the RR's. The distributions of the ND opinions differ only slightly from those of the DD's, in two cases appearing to be slightly more partisanly Democratic than the DD's and in the other four cases somewhat less. On the other hand, the differences between the distributions of the NR's and the RR's are generally larger and in every case the NR's tend to be less clearly Republican than the RR's.

When one considers the positions of the previously non-voting groups on individual issues, it may be seen that for the ND group four issues (governmental social welfare activity, Taft-Hartley Act, U. S. China policy, and U. S. entry in Korean war) show a significantly larger number of pro-Democratic than anti-Democratic attitudes. On the questions of U. S. foreign involvement and current U. S. Korean policy the ND's are so evenly split as to make any statement about the relationship between attitudes on those questions and behavior in voting most tenuous.

On only one issue, U. S. foreign involvement, did the NR's show greater partisanship as a group than did members of the ND group. On most of the other issues they were clearly less homogeneous in their views. It may be concluded that except for the foreign involvement issue and, possibly, Taft-Hartley, the voting behavior of the NR's was only casually or occasionally related to their stands on those issues explored in the survey. Furthermore, the issue-vote relationships were markedly smaller for the NR's than for the ND's.

This, of course, does not preclude the possibility that for each NR voter some one or two issues, but not the remaining issues, were relevant for activating his or her Republican vote. This is a necessary reservation which applies to all such analysis conducted at this level. The absence of direct relationship between factors X and Y insofar as any group of individuals is concerned does not mean that the relationship does not exist for any individual within the group. It does mean, however, that in this instance the existence of a factor "X" (attitudes on an issue) is not the influence which alone produced the factor "Y" (Democratic or Republican vote) which is held in common by all members of the group.

It is possible to compare these relationships between the attitudes of "regular" voters and "new" voters in 1952 to comparable data obtained in a Survey Research Center study in 1948. In the earlier study a similar sample were asked how they had voted in the 1948 and previous elections.¹¹ A summary of the data from the two studies is presented in Figure 1. It should be noted that the relative partisanship of the different voting groups is represented in this figure by dividing the number of responses in the group supporting Democratic policies by the sum of the responses supporting and opposing Democratic policies. Thus, a point above the 50 per cent line represents a pro-Democratic plurality; a point below the line represents an anti-Democratic plurality (although not necessarily a majority).

Figure 1 suggests that the role played by issues in activating former non-voters was different in 1952 than it had been in 1948. In the 1948 election voters who had previously been non-voters tended to take positions on issues with a degree of partisanship at least as great as that of the "regular" party voters. The plurality of ND's (individuals who usually had not voted but who voted Democratic in 1948) supporting Democratic policies in 1948 was approximately the same as that found among members of the DD (Democratic voters in 1944 and 1948) group. The NR's were in even greater agreement in supporting Republican policies than were their RR cohorts.

The 1948 election was, it seems in retrospect, by and large a party election. Neither candidate was overly attractive to people who were not confirmed party followers, the campaign was hardly the exciting, arousing campaign of 1952, and the outcome may have appeared to be so certain as to discourage usual non-participants from leaving their firesides to vote. In the absence of magnetic candidates or an exciting campaign, it may be argued that those usual non-voters who did vote in 1948 must have done so because of party loyalty or out of personal concern over particular political issues. If this supposition is valid, it then follows that the ND's and NR's of 1948 were largely party followers who knew the party line on the campaign issues, or they were citizens drawn into the political conflict primarily because of the issues. In any event, the ND's and NR's in a year of abnormally low turnout proved to be well aware of the political implications of their attitudes on issues and an unmistakably high relationship between their stand on issues and the direction of their vote resulted.

¹¹ The questions about earlier voting behavior were not exactly the same in the two surveys. In 1948 the respondents were asked, "Have you voted in any presidential elections before this one? Have you usually voted Democratic or Republican?" In 1952 they were asked "In 1948, you remember that Truman ran against Dewey. Do you remember for sure whether or not you voted in that election? Which one did you vote for?"

When the 1952 side of Figure 1 is examined it is seen that the degree of resemblance of the two groups of "new" voters to their "regular" counterparts is not the same as it had been in 1948. The attitudes of the ND's appear to be only slightly less Democratic in their direction than are those of the DD's. The NR's, however, who had been particularly partisan in 1948, were very near an even division in their attitudes in 1952.

The 1952 campaign differed from that of 1948 in a number of important respects. It presented two new candidates, one of whom was one of the most widely known and respected men in contemporary American life. It was featured by an intensity of campaigning and general political activity far beyond that of 1948. It was distinguished by the prominence of charges against the party in power, charges which were not issues in the sense used in this article but accusations of "corruption," "communist infiltration" and the like. It brought into focus more acutely than had been the case in 1948 the problem of over-extended one-party rule, the "time for a change" argument.

If it is surmised that the impact of these non-issue elements of the 1952 campaign was favorable to the Republican candidate, the issue positions of the ND and NR groups are not difficult to understand. It is known that the pool of 1948 non-voters, from which both the ND's and NR's came, was largely Democratic in usual party preference.¹² It was this fact that gave rise to the popular supposition before the 1952 election that an increase in turnout would be advantageous to the Democrats. If the "new" voters in 1952 had come into the ranks of voters solely on the basis of party loyalty or party-linked issues, their total vote would very likely have favored the Democratic candidate. However, the other forces at work in the campaign apparently succeeded in changing this Democratic majority into a slight Republican majority. Presumably the 1948 non-voters of a Republican inclination were joined in 1952 by enough defectors from the pool of non-voting Democrats (probably those least firmly committed to a Democratic position on issues) to create an NR group slightly larger than the remaining ND group. Considering this defection of recently, and perhaps only partially, converted Democrats in the NR ranks and the probability that irregular voters of both parties are less likely than their more regular cohorts to be sufficiently involved in politics to hold highly partisan attitudes, it is not surprising that the issue positions of the NR group should not be as partisan as those of the "regular" Republicans (RR's).

In summary, the data presented in this section appear to justify the following statements:

1. As a group Democratic voters were significantly more likely than Republican voters to support Democratic policies on all of the issues subjected to inquiry in this study:

¹² As shown in the 1948 Survey Research Center study and in as yet unpublished data from the present study.

2. The distributions of the attitudes of "new" Democrats were very similar to those of "regular" Democrats.

3. The distributions of opinions of "new" Republicans were generally less "Republican" than those of the "regular" Republicans. The general issue of extent of American involvement in world affairs was the only one on which this group was highly partisan.

4. A comparison of the voting of "new" voters in 1948 and "new" voters in 1952 suggests that differences in the electoral situations of the two years resulted in gains for the Republican party in 1952 which were not primarily associated with partisan issues as defined in this study.

II. THE "SHIFTING" VOTERS

A brief study of the reported previous voting behavior of the 1952 voters is enough to reveal that former Democrats who voted for Eisenhower held the balance of power in the 1952 election. While sizeable numbers of 1948 non-voters were coming into the ranks of 1952 voters, dividing their favors rather equally between the two presidential aspirants, smaller numbers of people who had voted in 1948 were withdrawing from the political arena to become non-voters in 1952. The net result of these additions and subtractions left the Republicans with an added six per cent of the population supporting their cause. In the same way, the Democrats picked up slightly more than two per cent of the population. As these sizeable, but to some extent compensating, shifts were occurring, some eleven per cent of the citizens were deciding to change their votes from 1948 Democratic to 1952 Republican (DR's). Although the net gain realized by the Republicans from the movement to and from active or inactive voting status was enough to jeopardize the Democrats' slim margin of 1948, the movement of changing voters away from the Democrats (offset only by a shift of one per cent in the other direction) was of crucial importance. The switching of the DR changers was not only a movement of a larger number of people, it was also a movement of double importance inasmuch as each Republican gain was also a Democratic loss.

All told, some 25 per cent of the final Republican vote came from 1948 Democrats. Given this added Republican support, only an extreme combination of pro-Democratic shifts among other parts of the total electorate could have salvaged the Democratic party hopes for victory. Conversely, if these "shifting" voters had remained Democrats, DD's instead of DR's, the other shifts which took place within the groups moving into and out of the active electorate would, at best, have been barely sufficient to create an Eisenhower victory.

When the attitudes of these "shifting" voters are compared to those of the "regular" voters of the two parties it will be seen that they occupy a position between the extremes on every issue (Table III). Their disagreements with the position of the "regular" Democrats are about equally great for both domestic and foreign issues. It must be noted, however, that these former Democrats do not go all the way to the "regular" Republican position on any of these issues. In this respect they differ from the DR's of 1948 whose partisanship on the issues of that year was scarcely less Republican than that of the 1948 RR's (see Figure 1).

The issue positions of the 1948 Democrats turned 1952 Republicans (DR's) resemble those of the 1952 Republicans who had not voted in 1948 (NR's). It will be recalled, however, that the NR's are made up of people of both Democratic and Republican party preference. Their intermediate position on issues appears to result from combining these two unlike groups as well as from their relatively low level of political involvement (as inferred from their non-voting in 1948). This is not the case with the DR's; they were all voting Democrats in 1948. The fact that the distributions of their attitudes digress so clearly from those of the "regular" Democrats may be explained in either of two ways:

1. The 1952 DR's may have been people whose attitudes had never been as "Democratic" as those of other Democrats, who had voted Democratic in 1948 out of a sense of party loyalty and the lack of any impelling reason to do otherwise, but who were jolted loose from the Democratic party in 1952 by some non-issue factor or combination of factors which was present in the electoral situation of that year.
2. The 1952 DR's may have been no more or less Democratic in their views on issues in 1948 than were other Democrats. During the ensuing four years they may have been converted from their Democratic point of view to a more nearly Republican position on issues. Having made this ideological transition it was natural for them to vote Republican in 1952.

It is probably safe to assume that both these mechanisms were at work in creating the 1952 DR's. If the process had been mainly one of conversion one might have expected that the foreign policy issues might have shown greater discrepancies from the "regular" Democratic position than would the domestic issues, considering the events of the 1948-1952 period. The fact that this is not true suggests that the "switching" voters were largely people who were not sufficiently bound to the Democratic party by conviction regarding its position on issues or by simple party loyalty to withstand the pressure of other factors which were important at the time of the campaign.

This section may be summarized in the following statements:

1. The "shifting" voters fell between the "regular" voters of the two parties in their attitudes on the issues presented in this study.
2. No single issue appears to have exerted any special influence in the defection of 1948 Democrats to a 1952 Republican vote.
3. It is suggested that the "switching" voters were particularly susceptible to factors favoring the Republicans because of their comparative lack of conviction regarding the Democratic position on partisan issues.

III. SOCIO-ECONOMIC GROUPINGS WITHIN THE ELECTORATE

The two preceding sections have dealt with the relation between voting behavior and six issues of the presidential campaign, with particular emphasis on the change in voting behavior between 1948 and 1952. In this section we will be concerned with the question of whether the relations between these issues and voting behavior were essentially the same for all classes of people within the electorate, or whether there were differential relationships for people in different socio-economic groupings. Since space does not permit a discussion of all relevant demographic groups, the discussion will center around four of the variables generally associated with the New Deal-Fair Deal coalition—occupation, union membership, education, and religion. We will compare the "regular" voters (DD's and RR's) found in these different groupings on their overall issue stand¹³ and on their attitudes on two selected individual issues.

Inter-group Comparisons on Overall Issue Stands. The distributions of attitudes of the different voting groups within demographic categories are presented in Table IV. Comparing the distributions of the "regular" Democratic voters (DD's) from group to group, and examining the inter-group comparisons of the "regular" Republican voters (RR's), one finds a very high degree of similarity within the demographic groupings. This is particularly true of the Republican voters (RR's). Catholic and Protestant, union member and non-union member, businessman and farmer—all classifications of "regular" Republicans took very nearly the same overall Republican position on issues.

¹³ By "overall issue stand" we mean a summary score based on the attitudes on all six issues, rather than the attitude on an individual issue.

The "regular" Democrats show somewhat more variation from group to group. For example, there is a tendency for better educated DD's to take a more homogeneous Democratic position than their less highly educated party associates. These distributions are based on small samples, however, and the differences which appear are not large.

Although the "shifting" voters and the "new" voters are not presented in Table IV, some mention may be made of their distributions. The DR voters, shifting to the Republican candidate from a Democratic vote in 1948, take a general issue position between the "regular" Democrats and Republicans in nearly all of the socio-economic groupings considered. The ND's and NR's also tended to follow the ND and NR issue pattern described in the first section of this report in all of the demographic subgroups studied. The samples of these voting groups are too small to support detailed presentation.

Inter-group Comparisons on Two Individual Issues. It might be reasonably objected that the failure of these data to show any sizeable differences in attitudes between people drawn from very different circumstances of life may have resulted from the combining of scores from six separate issues. It is possible, for example, that two RR groups that are similar in their distributions of combined scores might show significant differences on individual issues, differences that cancel each other out when the issues are combined. An intensive analysis of all six issues for all demographic groups is beyond the scope of this discussion. However, to give some indication of the additional variations revealed by an analysis of individual issues, inter-group comparisons were made for the DD's and RR's on the most general domestic and foreign issues, those pertaining to government social welfare activity and foreign involvement. The data are presented in Tables V and VI.

These tables show a number of variations from the pattern described in Table IV. Perhaps most striking is the fact that the different RR groups, which showed such similarity in their overall issue scores, differ considerably on these two individual issues. This is particularly evident when the RR's of the different occupational groups are compared. The Republican voters of higher occupational status take a more Republican position on the general domestic issue than do the lower status occupation groups, but are less Republican on the general foreign issue. "Regular" Republicans among "blue-collar" workers are as a group extremely "isolationist" in their views on foreign involvement but they do not support the Republican position on the role of the federal government in domestic welfare programs. As might be expected, the variations among the "regular" Republicans of different educational background follow the same pattern as those associated with occupational differences.

Following the general "cross-pressure" hypothesis,¹⁴ one might be led to explain some of these differences among "regular" Republican voters of different educational and occupational groupings as resulting from the interaction of party position and group position in determining attitudes on issues. Thus, when the issue position dictated by one's party choice comes in conflict with the position that is congruent with one's membership in a given socio-economic grouping, one might predict that there would be a compromise between the two extremes. Conversely, when a group position coincides with a party position on an issue, the result might be expected to be a position more extreme than either would have been without the other. Accordingly, one might explain the failure of "blue-collar" Republicans as a group to support the Republican position on the government welfare activity issue as the result of a position dictated by socio-economic group interest counteracting the position associated with party choice. On the other hand, the extremely homogeneous support that the "regular" Republicans of lower education give to the Republican position on the issue of U. S. foreign involvement might be thought of as resulting from a reinforcement of the restricted world view common among people of lower education by a congruent party position.

Although this interpretation may be appropriate for these variations among the "regular" Republicans of different education and occupations, it does not explain other variations which appear in the tables. Unlike the patterns of the RR's, which are different for the two issues, the inter-group occupational and educational patterns for the "regular" Democrats are the same for both issues. On both the foreign and domestic issues there is a tendency for DD's of higher occupational status (professional people and businessmen) to take a more homogeneous Democratic position than that taken by "blue collar" workers, and there is a similar tendency for greater support of the Democratic position to be associated with higher education. In terms of socio-economic group interest one might have expected "blue collar" Democratic voters to show more support for activity of the federal government in social welfare programs than would be shown by Democrats of professional or businessman status, whereas, as indicated in Table V, they tend to show less.

A similar discrepancy appears when differences between the attitudes of the "regular" voters of the two main American religious groupings are examined. If one were to assume that American Catholics might have special reasons to support an internationalist position in current foreign policy, one would expect that Catholics of each party would react more favorably to the foreign involvement question than Protestants within that party. In fact Catholic Democrats do support the foreign involvement policy in somewhat larger proportion than do Protestant Democrats, but among Republicans there is no difference between Catholics and Protestants on this issue. So far as this issue is concerned, religious group position appears to have some reinforcing influence on the attitudes of Catholics who voted for the Democratic party, but no modifying influence on the attitudes of Catholics who voted for the Republican party.

It is clear that these analyses of the interaction of the influences of party and socio-economic position are hazardous in the absence of the careful control of possible "third factors." More elaborate treatment of these data is not possible in the present article.

The data presented in this section may be summarized as follows:

1. When attitudes on the six issue questions are combined into a single score, the positions of "regular" Republicans among the basic occupational, union, educational and religious classifications are seen to follow very similar distributions. This is also true of "regular" Democrats in these different categories.

2. When distributions of attitudes on two individual questions are considered, differences between demographic groupings within the two parties are apparent and significant.

3. The determination of variations between socio-economic groupings within parties in their attitudes regarding issues is too complicated to be adequately described by the simple juxtaposition of party position and socio-economic position.

CONCLUSIONS

The analysis presented in this article was intended to show how the followers of the two major parties in the 1952 presidential election divided in their views regarding prominent campaign issues. It also sought to determine the extent to which shifts in voting behavior, from non-voting to voting and from one party to the other, were associated with attitudes on issues. Finally, it compared the issue positions of people of different socio-economic groupings within each party in order to study the influence of demographic position on relations between issue positions and votes.

Although questions might be raised regarding the selection of the specific issues which were chosen for study, it is noteworthy that all of the issues presented proved to be highly partisan, in the sense that they divided the Democratic and Republican voters to a degree that cannot be attributed to factors of chance. Although other questions might have been asked which would not have divided the voters significantly into party groupings, it is apparent that Democrats and Republicans differed in 1952 in their attitudes on the important issues tapped by the questions asked in this study.

It is also clear that "regular" party followers were as a group more partisan in their views on these issues than were people who do not vote regularly or who switch from one party to the other. The irregular voters as a group held attitude positions midway between the attitudes of regular Democrats and Republicans.

Those people who had not voted in 1948 but who voted in the 1952 election divided their votes between Eisenhower and Stevenson in about the same ratio as the rest of the population. There was a clear difference, however, in the degree to which these new Democratic or Republican voters shared the partisan position on issues of the party they supported. On the issues considered in this study, new Democrats were virtually as partisan as regular Democrats; new Republicans were significantly less partisan than regular Republicans. It is hypothesized that this discrepancy resulted from factors in the campaign situation, not associated with issues as defined in this study, which worked to the advantage of the Republican party.

In the same manner the shifting voters, those who had voted for Truman in 1948 but supported Eisenhower in 1952, were not as partisan as either the regular Republicans or Democrats in their views on the issues presented in this study. This leads to the supposition that these defectors, who made a critically important contribution to the total Eisenhower vote, were susceptible to the forces which led them to change their vote partly because they had no firm commitment to the Democratic position on foreign and domestic issues. By the same token, the fact that many of them have not accepted the Republican position on these issues implies that that party's hold on them is precarious.

Although the present article could not examine the effects of socio-economic position in great detail, the data are sufficient to indicate that they do not follow an entirely consistent pattern. Although in some cases factors associated with socio-economic position appeared to counteract party position as a determiner of attitudes, in other instances attitudes associated with party position seemed virtually unaffected by socio-economic differences. This question requires much fuller exploration before it can be adequately answered.

Finally, the reader is reminded again that the present article is a preliminary analysis taken from a study of much broader scope. It is hoped that some of the questions which are left unanswered in this presentation will be more adequately treated in the more comprehensive report which will be forthcoming.

APPENDIX I

The preceding discussion has dealt with demographic characteristics and the vote only as these characteristics related to differential commitment on a number of campaign issues. Since there may be some interest in data on the overall distribution of the 1952 vote in different demographic groupings, and a comparison with the comparable distributions in 1948, the following tables are presented. They show comparisons between the 1948 and 1952 vote of the occupational, educational, and religious groupings discussed in this report, as well as a number of others on which there are comparable data.¹⁵

The most striking impression gained from these tables is that the shift toward the Republicans in 1952 was a general one which affected many different classes of the population. Some components of the "Democratic coalition"—skilled and semi-skilled workers, Catholics, young voters, union members—showed large scale defections from their Democratic preference in 1948. The shift toward the Republicans was equally marked among groups which are not usually considered to be members of this "coalition." White collar workers, for example, went from an even vote distribution in 1948 to a ratio of almost 2 to 1 in favor of the Republicans; farmers, who had favored the Democrats in 1948, swung heavily into the Republican column in 1952. Except for the Negro group, the only groups which showed no shift in favor of the Republicans were those which already had a traditionally heavy Republican majority—the high status occupational and educational groups.

The numbers of cases of the separate demographic classifications do not always add to the total sample of 1614 respondents. This results from the omission of small numbers of respondents who did not fall into the classifications represented or from whom the relevant information was not obtained.

APPENDIX II

Reproduced here are the questions related to the seven campaign issues which were explicitly included in the questionnaire. The code categories following each question give in detail the manner in which responses were combined to indicate Pro-Democratic, Anti-Democratic or Neutral attitudes on each issue:

GOVERNMENTAL SOCIAL WELFARE ACTIVITY: "Some people think the national government should do more in trying to deal with such problems as unemployment, education, housing, and so on. Others think that the government is already doing too much. On the whole, would you say that what the government has done has been about right, too much, or not enough?"

Pro-Democratic

Definitely should do more

Should do more

Should do more on some, don't know or same on others

Anti-Democratic

Should do less

Definitely should do less

Should do less on some, don't know or same on others

Neutral

About right, OK

Should do more on some, less on others

Don't know

FEPC: "There is a lot of talk these days about discrimination, that is, people having trouble getting jobs because of their race. Do you think the government ought to take an interest in whether Negroes have trouble getting jobs or should it stay out of this problem? Do you think we need laws to deal with this problem or are there other ways that will handle it better? Do you think the national government should handle this or do you think it should be left for each state to handle in its own way? Do you think the state governments should do something about this problem or should they stay out of it (also)?"

Pro-Democratic

National government should pass laws and do other things too

National government should pass laws

State government should pass laws and do other things too

State government should pass laws

Government should take an interest, not ascertained how

Anti-Democratic

Government should do other things *only*National government should stay out, but state government should take action

Government (national and state) should stay out entirely

Respondent favors restrictive legislation (include here clear anti-Negro statements)

Neutral

Don't know

TAFT-HARTLEY LABOR LAW REVISION: "Have you heard anything about the Taft-Hartley Law? (If yes) How do you feel about it—do you think it's all right as it is, do you think it should be changed in any way, or don't you have any feelings about it? (If should be changed) Do you think the law should be changed just a little, changed quite a bit, or do you think it should be completely repealed?"

Pro-Democratic

Completely repealed

Changed quite a bit—in favor of labor

Changed quite a bit—not ascertained in whose favor

Changed a little—in favor of labor

Anti-Democratic

Changed quite a bit—in favor of management

Changed a little—in favor of management

Changed a little—not ascertained in whose favor

All right as it is

Neutral

Changed, not ascertained how much

Don't know

Never heard of Taft-Hartley

U. S. FOREIGN INVOLVEMENT: "Some people think that since the end of the last world war this country has gone too far in concerning itself with problems in other parts of the world. How do you feel about this?"

Pro-Democratic

THE REGION OF ISOLATIONISM

RALPH H. SMUCKLER

Michigan State College

Isolationism, a persistent refrain in the history of American foreign policy, has received its full share of recent investigation.¹ These investigations have followed a number of approaches, varying from historical research into the interaction of isolationist and interventionist groups and individuals in the pre-World War II period to studies of the underlying causes of isolationist thinking. It is the purpose of this paper to consider one of the ambiguities that still remain; that is, the commonly accepted assumption that in recent decades the Midwest has been the hard core of isolationism.

Midwestern isolationism is actually only one part of the larger question concerning the existence of a regional or geographic isolationist sentiment. On the untested assumption that isolationism is regional has rested the geographic explanation that isolationism is strongest in interior states because of the sense of insulation from international affairs that such location fosters. In this paper certain non-regional factors will be examined for their possible relationship to geographical centers of isolationist strength. Non-regional, socio-political factors might actually form the basis for several separate studies, and their consideration here is only intended to be suggestive of the further limitations these factors impose on a simple geographic explanation of isolationism.

Problems of Definition. The terms in this subject are corrupted by popular usage yet still used by scholars. Neither "Midwest" nor "isolationism" has an exact meaning. The Midwest as defined by some scholars includes five states; as defined by others, it includes fifteen. The variations in definition are endless.² Howard Odum, who has devoted considerable attention to careful definition in his study of southern regions, includes eight states (Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Wisconsin, Illinois, Michigan, Indiana, and Ohio) in what he terms the "Middle States." Odum bases his definition on approximately seven hundred indices of socio-economic and political characteristics of states.³ The Census Bureau, to take another example, divides the nation into a West North Central group of seven states (Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, the Dakota's, Kansas, and Nebraska) and an East North Central group of five (Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, and Ohio). For convenience, these two groups are commonly combined as the Midwest by those using census data.⁴

The variety of possible combinations does not end with these two. Cortez Ewing in his studies of presidential and congressional elections points out that by generous definition one could easily boost the number of possible regional combinations throughout the United States to more than a hundred.⁵ Geographer Nevin M. Fenneman, heading a special committee of the Association of American Geographers organized to define the natural divisions of the United States, found eight physiographic divisions.⁶ Other regional groupings appear in the writings of Arthur N. Holcombe, who found various regional patterns in his studies of political sectionalism.⁷ The National Resources Committee in 1935 summarized the views of a panel of experts on regionalism in this manner:

It seems to be agreed that regional boundaries are usually indefinite, being zones rather than lines. In the majority of instances, therefore, any boundaries which may be drawn will be necessarily arbitrary. It appears, however, that it is desirable to draw boundaries, providing their arbitrary nature be admitted.⁸

Most of the other studies defining national regions have recognized the problems noted in the Resources Committee's report. Some of them also mentioned the arbitrariness of following state boundaries in defining a region.

These difficulties in definition lead one to conclude that a region can be defined most usefully with limited criteria in mind. A geographer studying soils finds one regional pattern; a sociologist studying educational standards defines another; and a political scientist studying isolationist strength finds still another. Thus our question should not be "Is the Midwest the outstanding area of isolationist strength?", but rather "Is there any region of outstanding isolationist strength?" Then, after such an isolationist region is found (if possible), ⁴ The Census Bureau's geographic divisions are most frequently used as the basis for regional designations because census data are so commonly used by regionalists.

E. B. Logan (New York, 1938), Ch. 1; Our More Perfect Union (Cambridge, Mass., 1950), p. 71. In 1924, Holcombe defined the Midwest as a combination of eleven states: Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, and the Dakotas. A different regional pattern was described in 1938 and 1940. In 1950, basing his delineation of regions on a new, non-political basis, Holcombe described a third regional pattern.

it can be compared to a consensus Midwest region derived from the definitions of those who use the phrase "midwestern isolationism."

The term "region" itself requires definition. A region includes only contiguous territory: though the region need not be symmetric or balanced, its component units must be connected and its area reasonably compact. Some common characteristic, in this case strong isolationist sentiment, binds the components together and separates the region from the surrounding area.

Isolationism offers similar problems of definition. Is isolationism accurately represented by the sentiments of John Adams when he wrote, "I confess I have sometimes thought that, after a few years, it will be the best thing we can do to recall every minister from Europe, and send embassies only on special occasions."⁹ Is it represented by the words of George Washington when in his Farewell Address he advised against political entanglement in the affairs of Europe? Or perhaps Thomas Jefferson's words, "peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none," best serve to define American isolationism.¹⁰ One finds considerable variety in sentiments which historically have been labeled "isolationist." Thus in 1934 isolationists were said to have opposed the Reciprocal Trade Agreements program, an economic matter, while in 1939 it was maintained that isolationists opposed fortification of Guam, a Far Eastern matter. Some isolationist sentiment was used to justify opposition in 1934 to the Inter-American Highway program, a Western Hemisphere matter. But spokesmen for what has been termed isolationism have in recent years included certain parts of Europe in the American defense sphere, and supposedly isolationist statements have included recommendations for the stationing of American troops and the maintenance of American bases around the world.¹¹ advocates of complete isolationism have probably existed—isolationism in its true sense of complete lack of intercourse with any other nation. Such extreme isolationists would advocate American abstention from participation in the international activities—political, economic, and social—of even the Western Hemisphere. The opposite extreme can be termed anti-isolationism (perhaps internationalism or interventionism). While the isolationist favors inaction and non-participation by the United States in world affairs, the opposite extremists would favor constant and world-wide American international action. At least one variety of anti-isolationist would consider the negation of nationalism in favor of world government as his goal. There are probably few people at either end of the scale. Furthermore, a man might be an isolationist on one type of issue and an anti-isolationist on another. An attitude of political isolationism might be combined with an economic internationalist position. A senator might support measures to increase American trade with other lands and yet oppose all other participation by the United States in world affairs. To the extent that he supports American withdrawal or non-participation he would be an isolationist. Whichever view dominates his voting in the Senate determines the group in which he would be counted. According to this definition, therefore, the more isolationist person believes that the role of the United States in world affairs should be more restricted, non-entangling and less active than that envisaged by the less isolationist viewpoint.

Perhaps it is most accurate to consider isolationism as one end of a continuum, the other end of which can be considered anti-isolationism.¹² Though rare,

Votes in Congress As a Source of Data. What data can be used to determine whether an isolationist region existed during the past two decades? Three possible sources of data exist: election returns, public opinion polls, and congressional roll call votes. The third source, congressional roll call votes, is the most useful. Foreign policy issues in Congress were many and varied during the 1933 to 1950 period. Many of these issues were of the type to divide the members of Congress into more isolationist and less isolationist groups, and many of these produced roll call votes.

Though some objections can be raised to using these record votes to denote degrees of isolationism, none seem formidable. Certainly caution must be exercised in selecting the votes. Key amendments, motions to recommit, and borderline amendments must all be examined carefully. The issues themselves cannot be evaluated without investigation into the situation behind the mere wording of the proposal. However, when adequate care is observed in the selection of votes to be tabulated, sufficient data can be obtained from the voting in Congress to warrant considering one congressman or senator more isolationist than another.

Some objection might also be raised to transferring the voting record of a congressman to the district he represents. Does a congressman or senator vote his own mind, the mind of his party, or the mind of his constituency as he appraises it? If it is the mind of his constituency, and if the representative's appraisal is correct, then the transferral is valid. One of the basic assumptions in using this source of data to locate an isolationist region is that the congressman's ear is attuned to his district regularly enough to justify the transferral in the long run and over a large number of roll calls. The mere bulk of the evidence would tend to offset the occasions when the member of Congress is unrepresentative of the politically active portion (particularly the "foreign affairs public") of his constituency. Members of Congress register the effective opinion on foreign policy, and this is important. Furthermore, by examining the voting pattern in the lower house more closely than that in the Senate one would tend to narrow the margin of error, if the representative is assumed to be usually closer to his district than the senator is to his state-wide constituency. Congressional voting records, primarily votes on issues in the House of Representatives, provide the basic data used here for finding the region of isolationism.

A Region of Isolationism? Seventy-three roll call votes in the House and eighty-eight in the Senate were used in this analysis. They were distributed over the eighteen-year period as follows:

Congress	Number of Record Votes
	House	Senate
73rd (1933-1934)	6	2
74th (1935-1936)	2	7
76th (1939-1940)	10	11
79th (1945-1946)	12	14
80th (1947-1948)	9	11
81st (1949-1950)	16	23

Each of these roll calls was on a foreign affairs issue that divided the more isolationist element from the less isolationist (or more internationalist) group. The issues brought forth record votes on American participation in international organizations, on neutrality, foreign aid programs, the trade agreements program, lend-lease, and on similar foreign policy issues of the period. Such issues were frequently the centers of many amendments and moves of parliamentary strategy. When the votes on such side issues caused more than a minor change in voting alignment, they were used in this analysis together with the vote on the main issue. When the number of such supplementary roll calls warranted, a sampling process was used in order to avoid over-weighting the total number of votes tabulated in favor of one type of issue. The votes in the House of Representatives divide into subjects as follows: reciprocal trade, 10; aid to Allies (pre-1942), 13; international organization, 16; aid programs involving large appropriations, 33. There are other subject divisions that could be made, but this division shows that no one issue dominated. The issues involving authorizations for costly foreign aid included such questions as pre-World War II aid to the Allies, the European Recovery Program, Greek aid, lend-lease, the British loan and Far Eastern aid. These four subject categories are not mutually exclusive.

The ratio of isolationist votes to total votes cast by a state's representatives can be expressed as a "percentage of isolationism" for that state. This percentage can be compared to the "percentage of isolationism" found in a like manner in other states. The states can then be ranked in order of isolationism, with the state having the highest "percentage of isolationism" ranked as most isolationist. This same procedure can be followed for the Senate or for individual districts in the House of Representatives. Figures I and II present the states ranked according to isolationist strength in the House and Senate respectively for the period 1933-1950. Figure I presents the data derived from roll call votes in the House.

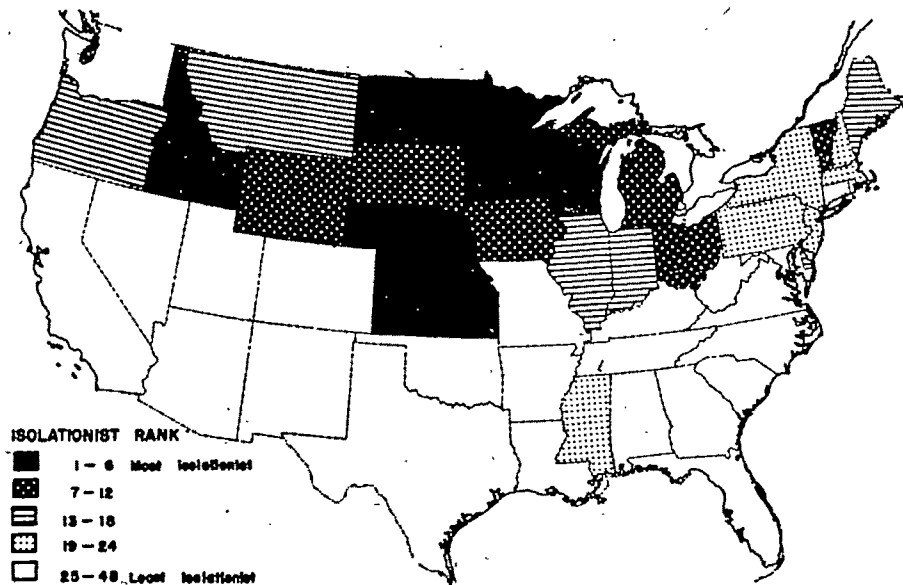

FIG. I. Isolationist Voting by States in the House of Representatives (73rd-81st Congress, 1933-1950).

When examined carefully, the data upon which the map is based support the conclusion that a broad band of isolationist strength existed across the northern portion of the United States as compared to a relative lack of isolationism in the southern and southwestern states. North Dakota was the most isolationist state in the nation. It was followed in order by Idaho, Kansas, Nebraska, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. The existence of this broad northern band of isolationism is the most obvious conclusion drawn from the data. The votes also indicate that a multi-state region of isolationism centered in the North Dakota to Kansas belt. This region included Ohio in the East and Idaho in the West and reached as far South as Kansas. Included in this region are eleven of the twelve most isolationist states, only Vermont being excluded.

The Senate voting records (Figure II) suggest a slight modification of these conclusions. The northern half of the nation is again distinctly more isolationist than the South. However, the region of isolationism in Figure II, though roughly similar, is not exactly the same as that found in House voting. North Dakota is again first in isolationist rank as it was in the voting in the House. Nebraska, Kansas, Ohio, Idaho, and Nevada follow in order. Thus four states—North Dakota, Kansas, Nebraska, and Idaho—are among the first six isolationist states in each house of Congress. In the Senate, as in the House, the core of isolationism in this period centered in the North Dakota to Kansas area.

The votes in the House of Representatives are more useful and more accurate for this analysis of the isolationist region than are the votes in the Senate.

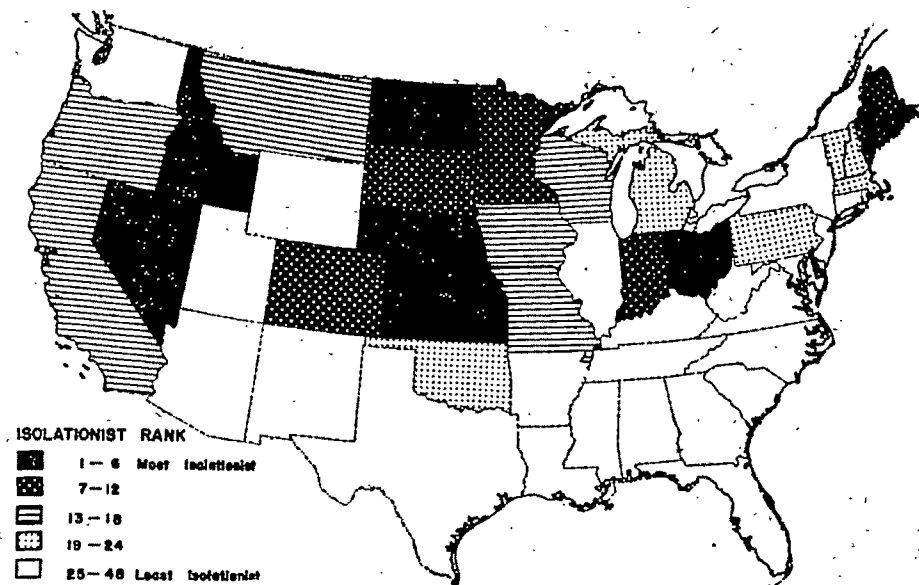

FIG. II. Isolationist Voting by States in the Senate
(73rd-81st Congress, 1933-1950).

Not only are the basic assumptions more sound in the case of the lower house, but also the votes can be examined for the congressional district, a smaller and more useful unit than the state. Figures III and IV show the districts in order of isolationist strength. Redistricting after the 1940 census necessitates dividing the period into two maps. These district maps must be viewed with some caution, since they are obviously not based on population, while the statistics presented on them are basically related to population density. Thus within the state of New York a small dot on the map represents an area including as many as twenty districts, while one district of roughly equal population is represented by an area twenty times as large. Not only must this differential be kept in mind in viewing individual states, but it must be observed in comparing low population states such as Montana with heavily populated eastern states.

It is obvious from Figures III and IV that no one region of the nation had a monopoly on isolationism in the 1933-1950 period. Heavily isolationist districts appeared in states from California to Maine and were found, in many cases, adjoining non-isolationist districts in their own states. The district breakdown does show, as did the maps by states, that isolationism existed in a northern belt and was relatively weak in the southern half of the nation. Proximity to the coast was not an absolute deterrent to isolationism. Some districts in coastal states elected and constantly reelected isolationist representatives, while some inland districts were represented throughout the period by non-isolationists. However, there were relatively more isolationist members of the House representing inland districts within the Ohio-Idaho region than districts in coastal states, as can be seen in the state totals represented in Figure I.

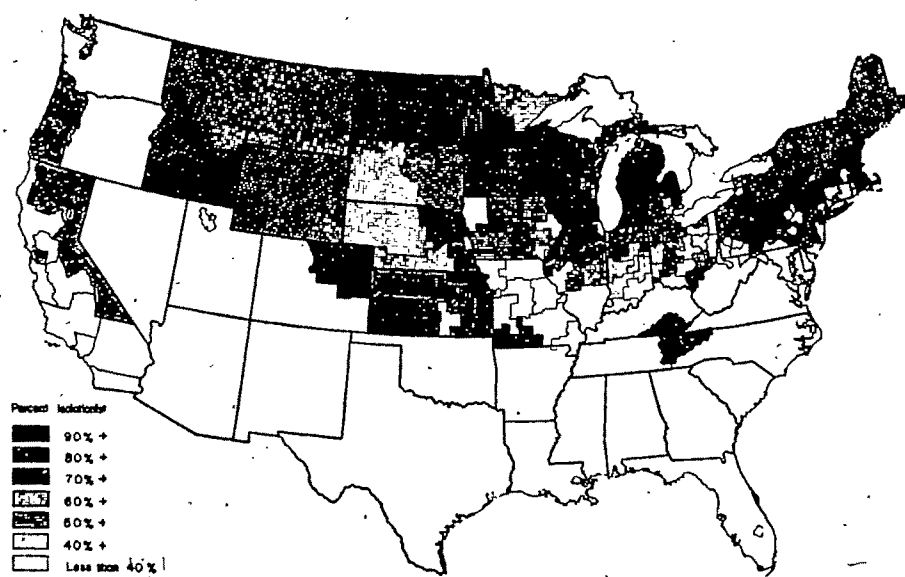

Fig. III. Isolationist Votes in the House of Representatives, 1933-1942, by Congressional District.

It is not possible to locate any large regions of isolationism on the maps based on districts. This is due in part to the area, rather than population, basis of the map. But even if one could overcome this handicap, the patchwork of isolationist districts next to non-isolationist districts indicates that no multi-state regions existed. This patch-quilt pattern disappears when the state figures are used because state percentages are actually averages of the districts within the state, and therefore hide the variations. The maps by districts, the most accurate units, suggest definite limitations to the conclusions drawn from maps by states.

In using House roll call data, controls can be exercised that enable one to make comparisons of state or regional isolationist strength on various types of issues. The region of isolationism identified in Figure I can be further examined by withdrawing roll call data on certain types of issues from the totals and then examining the resultant pattern for shifts in isolationist concentrations. For example, does the region of isolationism disappear as a region or, perhaps, center in another part of the country when all votes on reciprocal trade issues are excluded from the totals? Do the anti-reciprocal trade congressmen come from a different area than the anti-lend lease congressmen? Is there a region consistently reappearing throughout such variations in the data? It is also possible to divide the data into periods and examine the pattern of isolationist strength for shifts corresponding to time changes. Furthermore, the effect of political party affiliation on the voting pattern can be examined by studying separately the group of roll call votes on bi-partisan issues—those issues on which a majority of both parties voted on one side of the issue. Partisan influence on the data can be minimized by another method, that of studying the pattern of isolationism in the voting records of each party separately. This will show whether there were regions of isolationism within the Republican party and Democratic party in this period.

Analysis of ten roll calls in the House dealing with the Trade Agreements Program reveals a North-South break on this issue similar to the pattern in Figure I. All of the twelve most isolationist states on these ten issues are located north of the Kansas-Illinois-Ohio line. Of the twenty-four most isolationist states on this group of issues, only Florida and Nevada are south of the northern band of isolationism discernible in Figure I. All of the other twenty-two states are in the northern half of the country. Though the basic North-South cleavage follows the overall pattern (Figure I), the regional concentration within the North is considerably different. Two isolationist regions are easily identified in the reciprocal trade votes, a New England region and a Northwest region. Of the twelve most isolationist states on reciprocal trade issues, four are located in New England (Vermont, New Hampshire, Maine, and Massachusetts). The remaining eight are dispersed in an area reaching from Minnesota to the Pacific Coast. The effect of excluding the data on these ten roll calls from the total tabulation is to make the Ohio to Idaho region an even more pronounced isolationist region than is shown by Figure I.

Data for other groups of issues can be handled in a manner similar to the analysis of reciprocal trade issues, but none reveals as great a deviation from the basic regional pattern. Thus if the votes on issues concerning aid to the Allies, issues concerning United States participation in international organizations, and issues concerning foreign aid or relief programs involving large expenditures are analyzed as separate groups, the results in regional distribution follow a pattern quite similar to the original overall regional pattern in Figure I. With the exception of reciprocal trade issues, the region of isolationist strength remains consistently centered in the North Dakota to Kansas group of states.

The same general consistency is found when the data for the eighteen years are divided into two equal periods. Two exceptions to this general consistency are found, however. Relatively greater isolationism appears in New England before 1942, and increased isolationist inroads into the South appear in the post-1942 period. When the roll calls are divided into three equal time periods these two exceptions become more pronounced. In the 1933-1938 period the four northern New England states are solidly more isolationist than any other grouping of contiguous states in the country. In the 1945-1950 period two states, Louisiana and Mississippi, form an obvious "island" of southern isolationism.

In spite of these deviations from the overall regional pattern of Figure I, there is, with the possible exception of New England in the 1933-1938 period, sound basis for drawing the boundary line of the isolationist region along lines similar to the Ohio-Kansas-Idaho region in each of the shorter periods. Of the twelve most isolationist states, this region contained six states in 1933-1938, eleven in 1939-1944, nine in 1945-1950, eight in 1933-1941, and ten in 1942-1950. The significance of the New England isolationist region appearing in the early years of the period should not be minimized. Fewer issues were tabulated in the early period than in the last six years. Therefore the totals as shown in Figure I are weighted in favor of the later years. Actually, during at least the first third of the eighteen year period, northern New England was as isolationist as any other four-state region in the country.

If any one region of isolationism existed during the total period it was the region consisting of Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Wyoming, and Idaho. This eleven-state region contained within its boundaries a consistently high number of leading isolationist states, as evidenced by voting in the House of Representatives. There is sufficient evidence in the district data, however, to support the thesis that this region had no monopoly on isolationist congressmen. And there is evidence to support the conclusion that in the early years of this period there was no single region, and that isolationism shifted from the East to the West during the period. However, the region most consistently isolationist on the greatest number of types of issues and over the longest time period is the eleven-state region depicted in Figure I.

When partisan affiliations are taken into account, the region of isolationism becomes even more pronounced. A total of eighteen bi-partisan issues were used in this tabulation. All occurred in the last six years of the period. On these issues, ones in which a majority of both parties voted on the same side of the question, party affiliation certainly had a minimal effect on voting behavior. When these bi-partisan roll calls are tabulated as a separate group the same regional pattern appears as on the total tabulation. Eleven of the twelve most isolationist states are located in the region defined above.

If another means of eliminating the effect of party affiliation is applied, somewhat the same result occurs. That is, if the votes of Republicans on all issues are tabulated separately from those of Democrats, the regional pattern within each party can be studied. Of the states that frequently sent Republicans to Congress in the eighteen-year period, Nebraska, North Dakota, Illinois, Idaho, Michigan, and Montana ranked as the six most isolationist. Among the states that sent Democrats with some consistency, Idaho, Nebraska, Mississippi, Montana, Iowa, and Minnesota ranked as the most isolationist. These most isolationist states within each party lie in the Ohio-Kansas-Idaho region, Mississippi being the single exception. Elimination of the effects of party does not, therefore, affect the basic regional pattern seen in Figure I.

The Isolationist Region and the Midwest. The region of isolationism having been located, does it coincide with the midwestern region of the country? Actually, it is more difficult to locate the Midwest than it is to locate a region whose boundaries are determined by one criterion, isolationist voting in Congress. As previously indicated, there are many "Midwests." Whose definition is to be accepted? It is possible to derive a "consensus Midwest" from the many definitions used in lay and professional literature. There is a basic core of agreement, a group of states which rarely fall outside of varying definitions of the region. Included in this core are six states: Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, Iowa, Illinois, and Indiana. Surrounding this core are six states, part or all of which are sometimes included in the Midwest. These can be considered the midwestern fringe states: Ohio, Missouri, North and South Dakota, Kansas, and Nebraska.

How does this consensus Midwest compare with the isolationist region? The isolationist region extends further to the west than does the Midwest. Idaho and Wyoming lie outside of the midwestern region. Furthermore, the core of the isolationist region—Nebraska, Kansas, and the Dakotas—lies in the western fringe of the Midwest. One state in the Midwest fringe, Missouri, is not included in the isolationist region; and two core states of the consensus Midwest, Illinois and Indiana, are outside the most isolationist group. The two regions do overlap, but they do not coincide, nor is either region wholly included in the other.

In summary, what can be said about a regional pattern of isolationism in the period studied? First, the most obvious concentration of isolationist sentiment, as represented in Congress, was in a broad band reaching from coast to coast covering almost all of the northern half of the country. The absence of isolationist strength in the South and Southwest was in striking contrast to its presence in states of the North. This was generally true when partisan influence was eliminated from the data as well as when groups of issues and time periods were studied separately.

Second, the northern states themselves showed considerable variation in isolationist strength within state boundaries. Some of the most isolationist districts were located in Pennsylvania, New York, and Michigan in proximity to non-isolationist districts. Almost all eastern, midwestern and western coast states contained some districts ranking high in isolationist strength. Distance from the ocean was no accurate gauge of isolationist strength.

Third, with certain qualifications, a region of isolationism is discernible in the eleven-state area that includes Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Wyoming and Idaho. The most isolationist center of this region lies in four states, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, and Kansas. The qualifications on this definition of a region of isolationism are important enough to require restating. First, in the early portion of the eighteen years, New England was a second strong region within the northern band of isolationism. Secondly, throughout the period one or more very isolationist states existed outside the region. For example, when the Democratic votes were analyzed as a separate group, Mississippi and Louisiana appeared high in isolationist rank. A final qualification is suggested by the analysis of the data by districts. This analysis by smaller units makes it obvious that no region held a monopoly on isolationist sentiment, nor did the eleven-state region appear as an area of uniformly strong isolationist sentiment.

Fourth, the region of isolationism so defined fits only partially the midwestern region of the United States as defined in a consensus. The two regions overlap, but they do not coincide.

Non-Regional Factors. Are there factors other than regional location which characterize isolationist districts? Is there some socio-economic or political factor which is consistently found in an isolationist district but is absent from the anti-isolationist area? A region of isolationism was found to exist, with limitations, in the Ohio to Idaho portion of the country. Perhaps a non-regional correlate exists which will suggest further restrictions on a geographic explanation of isolationism based on the existence of such a geographic region.

It is possible to compare population characteristics such as urban-rural residence, economic level, educational level, percentage of foreign-born, and partisan affiliation of isolationist areas to non-isolationist districts. In each comparison, the counties of the isolationist and anti-isolationist districts within the same state can each be compared to the state average for the particular factor. By using the state average and comparing districts within the same state, variations due to regional differences can be eliminated. For example, the educational level in counties composing the two or three most isolationist districts in Illinois can be compared to the average educational level of the whole state. If 20 per cent of the isolationist counties have a higher educational level than the state, this "percentage higher" can be compared to a similarly determined percentage figure for the non-isolationist counties in Illinois. This procedure can be repeated in other states where a wide range in degrees of isolationism existed, permitting a comparison of the educational level of the most isolationist counties (components of the most isolationist districts) with the non-isolationist.¹³

Turning first to a consideration of rural-urban residence, there is sufficient evidence to conclude that rural areas were more frequently represented by isolationist voting congressmen than were urban areas in the same state. Twenty four percent of the counties composing selected heavily isolationist districts were more densely populated than their respective states; the comparable figure for anti-isolationist counties within the same states was 34 per cent.¹⁴ This difference of ten percentage points corresponds to results of other comparisons. When the isolationism of heavily populated areas in fourteen states was compared to the strength of isolationism in the state as a whole, in only one case was the urban community more isolationist than the state as a whole.¹⁵ In the other thirteen states, on the other hand, state exceeded urban isolationism by a sizeable margin. In four instances the state percentage of isolationism was more than twice that of the urban area. In six other cases, the state percentage was more than 50 per cent greater than the urban figure.

Another means of comparison can be used. If the strongly isolationist districts are classified as metropolitan, urban, semi-urban, and rural, the totals in each category can be compared with those in similar classifications of non-isolationist districts.¹⁶ This comparison is presented in the following table:

¹³ Statistics on socio-economic characteristics of the population, unless otherwise stipulated, were obtained from the Census of 1940.

Isolationist	63	15.8	12.7	25.5	46.0
Anti-Isolationist	42	47.6	16.7	2.4	33.3

Anti-Isolationist	24	79.2	8.3	4.2	8.3

Metropolitan and urban districts are those controlled by urban populations. In many semi-urban and in all rural districts, the rural population dominates. The division into two periods was made necessary by redistricting following the 1940 census. In both periods, the districts dominated by urban populations are found in relatively larger numbers in the anti-isolationist group. On the other hand, the isolationist group is dominated in each period by a preponderance of semi-urban and rural districts. The obviously frequent co-existence of isolationist strength and rural population dominance in a district points to the same conclusion as stated previously. Non-urban and rural areas are more frequently isolationist in Congress than urban and metropolitan communities.

A second non-locational factor, economic level, shows little relationship to isolationist strength. Whether one defines economic level in terms of rural level of living or of per capita income, analysis of congressional districts indicates little correlation between it and isolationism. Comparing the county rural level of living index to the respective state index in each case, we find that the indices of the isolationist counties are higher only two per cent more frequently than those of anti-isolationist counties. Per capita income comparisons yield similar results.

Educational level shows a somewhat more positive correlation with strength of isolationism than did economic level. In contrast with public opinion poll findings,¹⁷ analysis of the districts found to be isolationist or anti-isolationist leads to the conclusion that isolationism tends to be stronger in the more highly educated communities. Comparing the portion of the population in isolationist counties that finished the fifth grade and the percentage that finished high school to the similar part of the population in the non-isolationist counties, the isolationist counties were found to be more highly educated in both cases. Almost 49 per cent of the isolationist counties were above their respective state levels for fifth grade education; only 34 per cent of the anti-isolationist counties bettered their comparable state percentages. The comparable figures for high school education are 28.4 per cent higher for the isolationist and 20.4 per cent for the anti-isolationist counties.

The anti-isolationist districts had less than 5 per cent isolationism and were located in the same states as the isolationist districts.

There is little doubt that some correlation existed between the degree of isolationism in the 1933-1950 period in a particular community and the strength of certain foreign-born elements or foreign white stock in that community. A general correlation existed but there were many exceptions. The maps (Figures III and IV) showing isolationism by districts were compared to Census Bureau maps showing the proportion of the natives of various countries to the total population in 1890. One census map showing "The Proportion of the Natives of the Germanic Nations to the Aggregate Population," was very useful in these comparisons. Similar maps for Irish and Scandinavian elements were used, as well as maps based on the censuses of 1910 and 1920.¹⁸ Close comparison of the census maps to Figures III and IV made it possible to study the pattern of isolationism in relation to the distribution of foreign-born population. Other census data on foreign-born and foreign white stock in isolationist and non-isolationist counties were also useful.

In some areas a high degree of correlation was found. For example, the most isolationist areas of California, Oregon, Wisconsin, and Minnesota were relatively heavily populated with persons of Germanic origins. In general, the broad isolationist areas of the northern and eastern parts of the country were more heavily settled by Germanic peoples.

Important exceptions were found, however, and when smaller areas were analyzed more carefully, the more heavily German population did not always appear as the most isolationist, nor did all isolationist districts show a significant foreign-born population. For example, the isolationist areas of Tennessee and Kentucky appeared to be uninfluenced by foreign stock. Idaho and North Dakota, most isolationist of all, appear as relatively unpopulated by foreign born of German background. In Missouri, heavily Germanic St. Louis is the least isolationist portion of the state. The southern portions of Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana show similar inconsistencies.

Comparisons with other than Germanic population maps yielded similar exceptions to the general correlation. The Irish element in New England is an example. If Irish birth or parentage could be considered a link to isolationist sentiments in the period of American friendship and cooperation with England, one would expect to find isolationism stronger in heavily Irish southern New England than in northern New England where the Irish element is relatively sparse. However, Massachusetts was less isolationist than either Vermont, New Hampshire, or Maine, each of which is relatively uninfluenced by foreign-born population. This is not to suggest, however, that a general overlapping of Irish and isolationist areas was not common. It merely supports the conclusion that the generally close relationship of certain foreign-born and foreign-stock population elements with isolationist strength had many important exceptions.¹⁹

Partisan affiliation was closely related to isolationist voting. Of all votes cast by Democrats, 10.8 per cent were on the isolationist side. More than 57 per cent of the Republican votes supported the isolationist position. As indicated above, the partisan factor seemed to have a relatively small effect on the regional location of isolationism; that is, even with party influence eliminated the same region of isolationism was definable from the data.

In summary, this examination of non-regional factors suggests additional limitations on the importance of geographic region as a factor in isolationist strength. It seems clear that regional concentration of isolationism in the 1933 to 1950 period was but one of several identifiable characteristics: rural-urban residence, foreign origin or background, partisan affiliation and, to a lesser extent, educational level are characteristics joining together the isolationist districts and separating them, in some cases only slightly, from non-isolationist areas. Partisan affiliation and rural-urban residence were the strongest non-regional factors. Republicans were considerably more isolationist than Democrats. Rural areas were, with rare exception, more isolationist than urban districts within the same state. Though analysis does not indicate any relationship between economic level and isolationism, it does reveal a higher level of education in isolationist districts than in nearby non-isolationist districts. With important exceptions, heavily Germanic population areas tended to be more isolationist than neighboring areas of different national origins. Analyses of other nationality groups indicate similarly general relationships with isolationism and also suggest important limitations to any generalizations on this one factor. Thus, not only is the definition of a region of isolationism surrounded by doubt; but, if defined, the importance of the regional factor is lessened by the fact that other, non-regional correlates are readily discernible.

This analysis allows one only to speculate as to the causes of isolationism. No cause and effect relationship, no explanation of isolationism, can be stated firmly from these conclusions. But if one were to speculate, the soundest explanation would undoubtedly lie in the direction of a combination of these factors—regional and socio-economic—and others. Certainly no single or double factor explanation is possible. Each of these needs further investigation if we are better to understand isolationism, and, more generally, the attitudes of Americans toward foreign affairs.

¹⁹ Findings in this research do not support the relatively strong statement of relationship between isolationism and national origins found in Samuel Lubell's works, n. 1. Though the relationship exists, it is but one of several such correlations, and does not seem to be the strongest.

AGRARIAN SYNDICALISM IN POSTWAR FRANCE

GORDON WRIGHT

University of Oregon

In an age of mass movements and pressure groups, even the most rugged individualists find that organization pays. So it is that the French peasants, surely among the most rugged of all individualists, have embarked since World War II on a major experiment in syndical unity. In place of their prewar organizations, which were relatively weak and deeply divided, a single Confédération Générale de l'Agriculture has brought together approximately 80 per cent of all French farmers.¹ In the lobbies of Parliament, in the antechambers of the ministers, in the Economic Council, and in some 280 government commissions, the CGA represents the interests of the agricultural profession. Its existence plainly constitutes a new socio-political factor in the Fourth Republic.

Potentially, a united farmers' organization would seem destined to be the most powerful pressure group in France. Organized labor has mass voting support; the organized employers have rich financial resources; but only the farmers possess both of those weapons.² Yet the CGA today, after eight years of existence, continues to be a somewhat marginal power factor in French politics. Its dues-paying membership has dropped off markedly since the 1947 peak; its lobbying activities have produced only spotty results; its central organs are weakened by internal feuds and tensions. Critics proclaim from time to time that the CGA has no real influence among its members and no real prestige in the nation; they predict that it is doomed to disintegration or collapse. Clearly, the organization has not yet fulfilled the hopes of its founders. Nevertheless, it survives, and each year of survival strengthens the likelihood that some kind of agrarian syndicalism on a mass scale is here to stay in France. This essay proposes to examine the CGA's record to date, and to assess its actual and potential role in French politics.

Farm syndicalism in France is a relatively recent phenomenon. Although the first such organizations were formed in the 1880's, none of them developed mass support until the last decade of the Third Republic. As late as 1929, not more than one peasant out of seven belonged to a syndicate,³ and as a rule his chief motive was to get cheaper fertilizer rather than to express a sense of class solidarity or to ensure the defense of agricultural interests. Furthermore, this organized minority of peasants was split into several different syndicates, each with its own political color. The impact of the depression speeded up syndical activity in rural areas, so that by 1940 one peasant out of three or four had been "unionized."⁴ But division rather than unity continued to be the rule; there still existed no peasant syndicate which could inspire politicians with the respect or fear which the labor unions, for example, could command. Such political influence as the peasantry possessed (and that influence was traditionally very great in France) came through the massive bulk of their voting power, and through the curious electoral system which made the Senate their special preserve. Even before 1940, however, some farm leaders were becoming convinced that their amorphous electoral strength was no longer enough; that to it, there must be added a new organized syndical strength. Vichy's Peasant Corporation was in part the product of this prewar sentiment. Whatever the Corporation's faults (and they were many), it did give the peasantry a taste of unity and potential power which some of them were determined to preserve.

The origins of the CGA go back to this Vichy period—to 1943, when French patriots could begin to envision the end of the German occupation and could begin to plan for a brave new world. It was conceived by Pierre Tanguy-Prigent, a young Breton peasant who had entered politics in 1936 as a Socialist deputy. Tanguy, who had sought unsuccessfully to build a strong Socialist organization among the farmers before the war, realized that the liberation might give him a new chance. Late in 1943, with a few friends, he sketched out plans for a unified national confederation which would parallel labor's CGT. An underground newspaper, La Résistance Paysanne, was founded to propagandize for the cause, but there was barely time to publish two issues before the Allied forces landed in France.⁵

With the rout of the German armies and the collapse of the Vichy regime, Tanguy's rudimentary plans were threatened from two quarters. First, the Algiers government of General de Gaulle decreed in July, 1944 that all prewar farm groups which Vichy had abolished were to be resuscitated. Such a return to the prewar pattern of division and weakness, Tanguy felt, had to be blocked. Tanguy's chance soon came when de Gaulle, on the recommendation of resistance leaders, named him Minister of Agriculture in the first post-liberation cabinet. One of his first acts was to abrogate the Algiers decree, and to order instead that a single peasant organization be authorized to exist.

⁴ Augé-Laribé's estimate for 1939 is one million peasants in farm organizations of some sort (loc. cit.). Meanwhile, the total farm population had dropped. The largest syndicate of the 1930's—the UNSA—claimed at the time to represent 1,200,000 families.

The second threat came from the Communists. Throughout large parts of central and southern France, they had built a network of peasant resistance groups—the so-called Committees of Peasant Defense and Action (CDAP). At the liberation, these groups seized control of local farm newspapers and Vichy Corporation offices; and their leaders (notably Léopold Rambeau and Jean Laurenti) convoked a CDAP congress at Toulouse in November at which they planned to create a permanent national organization. With some difficulty Tanguy persuaded the Communist leaders to abandon these plans and to merge their CDAP with the new CGA. Evidently the Communists decided that they could effectively colonize and control the larger organization from within. At any rate, they converted the Toulouse congress from a baptismal into a funeral rite, and the CDAP disappeared in an orgy of speechmaking.

Meanwhile, Tanguy's plans were rapidly taking shape. In October, 1944, he appointed a National Committee of Agricultural Action to build the framework for the CGA. He also set up local committees for each department of France, to supervise the establishment of village and departmental units. The National Committee, hand-picked by Tanguy, was remarkable for its high proportion of Socialists and its low ratio of peasants. Only five of the seventeen members were farmers, and the key figure, Philippe Lyonnet, was a high official in the electricians' union.⁶

The task of blueprinting the machinery for so complex and unwieldy an organization as the CGA was a forbidding one. Although in theory the planners were starting from scratch, in practice a complicated series of farmers' organizations still existed at the end of the war. Almost ten thousand cooperatives of varying size were scattered throughout the country; even Vichy had not been able to fuse them effectively into national units. Likewise, separate hierarchies of mutual aid societies and of farm credit associations had grown up over several decades. More important still were the so-called "specialized associations" which grouped the wheat growers, the sugar-beet producers, the wine-growers, and so on. These groups had sprung up during the two decades before 1940, and had come to be the most effective of all farm pressure groups. Finally, there were the remnants of several prewar farmers' syndicates whose leaders, of Leftist sympathies, were free of the Vichy taint. On the other hand, those prewar syndicates which had rallied to Vichy (and the largest ones had done so) were doomed to extinction, and their leaders were excluded from any share in planning the CGA.

This inherited complexity made it clear that the CGA, as its name indicated, would have to be a confederation rather than a unitary structure. As finally worked out, the blueprint provided for seven national federations as the component units of the CGA. Three of them would bring together the principal technical branches of farm organization: the cooperatives, the mutual aid societies, and the farm credit associations. Three others would represent certain special segments of the rural population: the agricultural technicians and the farm laborers (the latter divided between a Catholic and a Communist federation, as in prewar days). The seventh federation would be the most novel and potentially the most significant. Labelled the Fédération nationale des syndicats d'exploitants agricoles (FNSEA, or Farmers' Federation), it would be open to all active farm operators, whether owners, tenants, or sharecroppers. In it, the whole agricultural population except absentee landlords and farm laborers would be represented directly. In the other federations, in contrast, the peasants would be represented indirectly through cooperative or mutual aid officials (generally technicians or bureaucrats rather than farmers). The FNSEA, therefore, would rest upon remarkably broad base of some two and one-half million peasant families, whose consolidated voting strength might give the Paris politicians something to think about. Here, rather than in the CGA above it, would be the peasants' own trade union.

Tanguy-Prigent and his associates, however, intended no such dominant role for the FNSEA. They aimed, rather, to make it one subordinate segment of a powerful CGA, with the confederal organs functioning not as a mere capstone linking seven autonomous federations, but rather as the central agency of guidance and decision. Such was the nature of labor's CGT, within which the various federations were only parts of a greater whole. The voice of the FNSEA would be influential in CGA councils, but its desires could presumably be overridden by the votes of the technicians, bureaucrats, and farm-labor organizers. And these latter groups, as Tanguy and everyone else of course knew, were predominantly Leftist in their political views.

But Tanguy and his advisers had in mind something more than building a Socialist political machine among the farmers. Their principal aim in this rosy liberation epoch was to revolutionize French agriculture. This did not mean (as their enemies then and since have alleged) that they aimed to collectivize French farming on the Soviet model.⁷ What they wanted, rather, was a planned, renovated, efficient agriculture in place of the old heterogeneous agrarian structure which contained everything from the medieval to the ultra-modern. They proposed the rapid mechanization of agriculture; the cooperative use of machinery; the consolidation of small scattered strips of land into larger units; the expansion of cooperative buying and marketing; and the planning of crops on a rational, nation-wide basis. Such a program could not be carried through by the peasants themselves; it could be achieved only by governmental action working through the technicians with the consent of the peasants. The CGA was envisaged as one of the major agencies for carrying out this agricultural revolution; therefore the balance of power within it would have to favor the technicians and bureaucrats rather than the peasant mass.

With these aims in mind, the CGA's planners moved rapidly from the blueprint to the construction stage. It is worth noting that in this process, the CGA's confederal organs were set up first, and the most important federation—the FNSEA—last. In a sense, therefore, the CGA was built from the top down. Late in 1944, under the guidance of Tanguy's local Committees of Agricultural Action, peasants met in villages throughout France to form local CGA units and to elect their officers by show of hands. In the Center and Southwest, this process was simple: the local CDAP, usually under Communist leadership, simply took over the CGA label. The problem was more difficult in regions where the local peasant elite had supported Vichy. Tanguy's appointees saw to it that Vichyites were shunted aside, but it was not always easy to find other village leaders in their place. By March, 1945, however, the ground had been prepared for the CGA's first national congress. Delegates from almost every part of France gathered in Paris to celebrate the achievement of peasant unity, and to consider the proposals of Lyonnet's preparatory committee.

On the face of it, the congress was a great success for the planners. Oratory flowed in profusion: Tanguy-Prigent greeted the delegates at such length that one peasant said he must have been speaking for both Tanguy and Prigent. Lyonnet's report was approved almost without debate, and the Lyonnet group was left in control of the CGA's permanent machinery. Still, some signs of peasant dissatisfaction were already apparent. One Catholic delegate got the floor to declare that syndical unity could be nothing more than a facade; that the French peasantry was too varied to be represented by a single organization. He was promptly howled down, for the mystique of unity was still powerful in that post-liberation era. The malcontents managed only to get several more non-Socialists added to the CGA's top council, and to extort from Tanguy a promise that a more representative congress would be held within a year.⁸ Some weeks later, Tanguy retreated before Catholic pressure and promised that syndical liberty would shortly be restored. He insisted, however, that the CGA's temporary monopoly of the right to form farmers' organizations would have to continue until the CGA had been completely built. Otherwise, he argued, peasant unity might be wrecked by selfish political rivalries.

The chief remaining organizational task was the establishment of the Farmers' Federation (FNSEA). All of the other federations, as well as the CGA capstone, were in place and functioning by mid-1945. But the FNSEA, if it were to mean anything at all, could not be set up by decree and direction from above: it required free elections at the grass-roots level. Such elections would be the first real test of peasant opinion since the CGA planners had begun their work; the outcome might have a vital effect on the CGA's future. Shortly before this critical moment arrived, Tanguy took one last step to keep the new FNSEA within bounds. He decreed that the syndicates would be denied the right to engage in business activities: e.g., to buy fertilizer or to market their members' crops. The prewar farm syndicates had gotten their start through such prosaic but useful operations, and had held their members' loyalty mainly through such services. Now, however, those functions were to be monopolized by the cooperatives, while the FNSEA would confine itself to purely syndical activities. This decision, while logical enough, left many peasants skeptical about the purpose and utility of the FNSEA.

⁸ Despite the idealistic tone which pervaded the congress, the liveliest applause went to a delegate who demanded that the national dues be reduced from 20 to 10 francs, on the ground that "We don't intend to maintain a collection of bureaucrats in Paris."

Early in January, 1946, the peasants went to the polls. There had been some controversy in Paris over the question of eligibility to vote; according to rough estimates, only about one-third of the three million farm operators had formally adhered to the CGA or to one of its technical branches. It was finally ruled that all farmers might vote, and that the act of voting would automatically make them members of the FNSEA. In each commune, delegates were to be chosen to a departmental assembly of the Federation; and from these assemblies would come the delegates to the first FNSEA congress in Paris.

What proportion of the peasants responded to the election call is still obscure. CGA officials announced triumphantly that approximately 70 per cent had turned out, and that the farmers had proved their passionate interest in syndical unity. Hostile observers placed the figure at about one-third; but as no statistics were ever published, an accurate estimate is impossible.⁹ Far more important was the character of the vote cast; and CGA leaders had less reason to rejoice when they saw the kind of delegates who had been chosen. Jubilant conservatives claimed that 80 per cent of those elected had not previously been active in the CGA. At any rate, a strong trend away from the Left was evident almost everywhere except in central and southern France. In Tanguy-Prigent's home department of Finistère, only three Socialists were elected. The Communists too were sorely disappointed, despite a number of victories in the Center and Southwest. Their candidate for the national presidency of the FNSEA, Waldeck Rochet, could not even win election to the presidency of his departmental unit in Saône-et-Loire.

This FNSEA election represented in part a conscious peasant revulsion against the organizers of the CGA, whose interests seemed to them to be urban and political rather than rural and professional. Even more, however, it represented a natural village tendency to choose tried and trusted local spokesmen:

the same men who had been active in prewar farm syndicates or cooperatives and, often, in the Vichy Corporation. The rural elite in France is small; the liberation did not magically produce a new elite to take the place of the old. In most cases, therefore, the peasants returned to the leaders whom they knew. In areas where the village elite had been Leftist (notably in the South and Center), those same Leftists were elected in 1946, but throughout most of the northern half of France, the Christian Socialists or Rightists swept the polls. In the first national congress of the FNSEA which followed shortly, the posts of command went to centrists and conservatives. Eugène Forget, a Christian Socialist smallowner from the Angers region, became president; and the number two post of secretary-general fell to an unrepentant Rightist—René Blondelle, a large-scale operator from northeastern France. Both men had held positions in the Vichy Corporation—Forget in a minor role, Blondelle near the top. Clearly, a new phase in CGA history was about to begin.

The first phase in the CGA's development (1944–46) had been concerned mainly with organizational problems, and had been dominated by Leftist planners. The second period (1946–1950) was marked by a sporadic internal conflict over the structure and spirit of the CGA. Three major factions were competing in this "cold war." The Leftists (mainly Socialists, with a minority Communist wing) still clung to control of the CGA's confederal organs, and sought to keep the locus of power there. Their rising star, rapidly eclipsing Lyonnet as the chief Leftist spokesman in the CGA, was Philippe Lamour—a colorful and controversial figure who had been chosen secretary-general of the CGA in 1945. Lamour had had a checkered but intriguing career: a brilliant young lawyer in the 1930's, a prolific novelist and world traveler by avocation, he had been forced to abandon his legal practice shortly before 1940 and had taken to operating a large farm—first near Vichy, then in the deep south near Nîmes. Lamour's political record was as bizarre as his professional career: he had been a Radical Socialist candidate for deputy in 1936; had served as one of Ana Pauker's lawyers in Rumania in the same year; had allegedly gone through a brief Pétainist stage in 1940; and had emerged after the liberation as an unaffiliated Leftist. Although his enemies scoffed at Lamour as a "comic-opera peasant," his unflagging energy, his persuasive oratory, and his personal charm brought him to the top in the very first months, and kept him there long after other Leftists had been shunted aside.

The Rightist faction found its natural center of gravity in the FNSEA; its aim, therefore, was to shift power from the confederal organs to the separate federations, and to make the FNSEA virtually autonomous. The ablest spokesman for this viewpoint was René Blondelle, whose vigor and tenacity balanced the dynamic brilliance of Lamour. Blondelle had a record of twenty years' activity in agrarian syndicalism in the Aisne department, where he rented and operated a 600-acre farm. His social conservatism had led him in the direction of corporatist doctrine before 1940, and he had therefore been a natural supporter of Pétain. After the liberation, the farmers of the Aisne had at once reaffirmed their confidence in him by reelecting him as head of their local organization.

Between the Left and the Right, the Christian Socialist element held the balance of power during this transitional era, and sought to find some compromise which would preserve peasant unity. Eugène Forget, its principal spokesman, was one of the most remarkable rural leaders to emerge in the post-war period. A sincere and selfless man with a purely local reputation before 1946, Forget was overwhelmed by the unexpected honor which came to him when he was chosen first national president of the FNSEA.¹⁰ During his three years in office, he strove unceasingly to mediate between the factions in his organization, and to shift the CGA's focus from the peasant as producer to the peasant as human being. In his few spare moments, Forget managed to commute to his 40-acre farm, and to keep it a model of efficiency and modern methods. Forget's more cynical critics treated him as naive and "soft," useful only as a buffer during a period of internal stress. But to many of those who knew him, he served as a kind of symbol of personal integrity and sincere dedication to the welfare of rural France.¹¹

The CGA's inner tensions during this transitional period are not easy to analyze, for politics, personalities, and differences of principle all played a part. The central fact, however, was the struggle for power between the Leftist technicians and planners in the cooperatives and at the top of the CGA, and the Rightist element in the FNSEA whose emphasis on "the organized profession" smacked more and more of corporatist doctrine. René Blondelle brought the dispute into the open at the FNSEA'S second congress in November, 1947. The peasants' new union, he declared, was hamstrung by the confusion of authority between the CGA and the FNSEA. Housed in the same building, sharing the same secretarial services, the officials of the two groups were continually stepping on each others' toes and disputing over the locus of authority. The solution, he argued, was to strip the CGA confederal organs of everything except a small secretariat. He proposed to make it merely a coordinating organism, while all of the CGA's essential services (including the official newspaper, La Libération Paysanne) would be transferred to the FNSEA. Such a change, declared Blondelle, would drive politics out of the organization, and would leave syndical interests supreme. Blondelle also proposed that minority factions in the FNSEA be squeezed out of the Federation's Bureau (the top policy-making body) by allowing the majority to elect the entire Bureau.¹²

Blondelle's blunt assault stirred up a violent debate; and while his report was adopted by a large majority, most of the thorny issues contained in it were referred to a committee for further study. No group wanted to take the initiative in forcing a showdown which would have split the CGA; the facade of unity was therefore maintained. For two more years, the internal bickering went on, but it was clear that the Blondelle faction was steadily consolidating its hold. One factor which strengthened the Rightists was the revival of the prewar "specialized associations" (such as the Wheat Growers' Association) and their partial absorption by the FNSEA. Several of these groups were wealthy, powerful, and aggressively led; they were potentially dangerous to the CGA either inside or outside it. In 1947 they were finally brought into the FNSEA as semi-autonomous units, with separate budgets and separate representation on the FNSEA's national council. Their most vigorous spokesmen were Rightists who threw their support to the Blondelle group, and who exercised an influence out of proportion to their numbers.

Meanwhile, the Leftists in the CGA were being progressively weakened. One symbolic blow was the fall of Tanguy-Prigent from the Ministry of Agriculture in 1947, and his replacement by Pierre Pflimlin of the MRP.¹³ Another setback was a split in the cooperative movement; some of the largest and oldest cooperatives seceded from the Central Union of Agricultural Cooperatives which the Leftists had founded after the liberation.¹⁴ Still another source of weakness was the Communists' effort to carve out a special preserve for themselves within the FNSEA. Disgruntled at their poor showing in the FNSEA elections, the Communists decided to try to split the 700,000 small tenants and sharecroppers away from the main body of peasants. Late in 1946 they suddenly announced the creation of a Tenants' and Sharecroppers' Association which, as they planned it, would have been a completely autonomous unit within the FNSEA. This maneuver was partially blocked by the various non-Communist elements, who joined the new organization, got their man elected president, and voted to make it merely a "section" of the FNSEA rather than an autonomous "association." The new Tenants' and Sharecroppers' Section (SNPBR) failed to develop much momentum during the years that followed, but its existence further divided and weakened the Left-wing element within the CGA.¹⁵

¹⁵ Useful details on the origins of the SNPBR may be found in the MRP's farm weekly,

By 1950, the Rightists were ready to take over outright control of the FNSEA, and to inject into it a more aggressive and intransigent spirit. At the fourth national congress in March, President Forget announced his resignation, remarking sadly that his efforts at mediation and persuasion had found little echo either in syndical or in governmental circles. He was replaced as president by René Blondelle, while another Rightist, 300-pound Jean Laborbe, took over as secretary-general. The last remaining Communists, and most of the Socialists, were pushed off the Bureau of the FNSEA. A new strategy of mass peasant demonstrations, buyers' strikes, and direct political action was promised by the Blondelle leadership.

Since that time, the Rightists have completely dominated the FNSEA, and the FNSEA in turn has increasingly dominated the CGA. It is true that Philippe Lamour still clings to his post as CGA secretary-general, and that a prominent cooperative official, Pierre Martin, has been CGA president since 1950. These, however, are exceptional cases. In the CGA's central offices behind the Opéra in Paris, only a handful of bureaucrats from the 1944-46 era remain. Socialists and Christian Socialists are clearly outnumbered in the CGA's national council, and the Communists have been totally excluded from posts of influence.¹⁶ The CGA no longer holds an annual congress; only the component federations such as the FNSEA meet in full session. Outwardly at least, 1950 seems to have marked the end of factionalism, and the achievement of syndical unity and solidarity.

Appearances, however, can be deceiving. Behind the facade of harmony and unity, both the peasants and their leaders have been in frequent internal conflict. At the top, the old Left-Right feud still smolders, and flares up briefly at intervals. In April, 1952, for example, René Blondelle (president of the FNSEA) and Pierre Martin (president of the CGA) were rival candidates for the national presidency of the revived Chambers of Agriculture.¹⁷ Blondelle won, but by a Monde Paysan, for April 30 and Sept. 24, 1947. The SNPBR's newspaper admitted in 1951 that fewer than 200,000 tenants and sharecroppers were dues-paying members, and that very few of them took the trouble to read the official organ (Le Fermier et le Métayer, April, 1951).

In 1952 the non-Communists took full control of the SNPBR, and replaced every Communist who had held a high post in it. The Communists then proceeded to organize a new subdivision of the SNPBR, of dubious legal status, and confined to fifteen central and southern departments where Communist rural strength is great (La Terre, March 13 and 20, 1952). They denounce M. Bajeux, the new secretary-general of the SNPBR, as a "gros fermier capitaliste du Nord." When I visited M. Bajeux's farm in 1951, I found this "big capitalist" stripped to the waist in his barn, putting in hay along with two hired hands.

margin of only 47 to 37 votes; his victory has increased the restlessness of the Leftist element in the cooperative, mutual aid, and farm credit federations of the CGA.¹⁸ The same conflict appears when a Rightist cabinet like that of Antoine Pinay adopts measures which irritate the peasantry. Then the FNSEA's Rightist majority is torn between loyalty to the cabinet and a desire to protect farm interests, while the Leftist element denounces the government with redoubled fervor.

But there are other lines of cleavage in the CGA as well. Once the Rightists had won clear control of the organization, they could afford to revive their own internal differences. One issue which soon arose was the question of direct CGA intervention in politics. Most of the Rightists favored such intervention in the 1951 elections, but only part of them advocated the creation of a separate peasant party rather than activity within the established parties.¹⁹ Partially linked to this issue was the broader question of corporative doctrine: some CGA leaders still insist that the parliamentary republic must be modified or replaced by a corporative structure, founded upon the organized professions.²⁰ Still another controversy has brought to grips the "expansionists" and the "malthusians" within the CGA. Until 1948 at least, all factions in the CGA had rallied to the "expansionist" doctrine of the CGA's founders, who preached that French agriculture should vastly improve its productivity and expand its production in order to become a great exporting branch of the national economy. From 1948 on, however, the farmers' optimism dimmed as their production began to catch up with demand, and as the favorable price scissors began to turn against them. A "neo-malthusian" doctrine began to make headway among certain farm leaders, who urged a return to the prewar tradition of limited production for a highly-protected domestic market. Such a policy was frankly proposed at the FNSEA's congress in 1951 by Jean Deleau, head of the Wheat of farm interests. They were elected by the peasants and by organized farm groups, and had a regular though small source of income from taxes. Vichy suspended them in 1940, and their surviving members demanded that they be reactivated after the war. CGA leaders resisted this demand for several years, on the ground that the CGA had taken over the functions of the Chambers, and that useless rivalries between the two would split the peasantry. A compromise was finally reached which permitted the revival of the Chambers, with slates of candidates jointly drawn up by Chamber and CGA leaders. Early in 1952, these slates were elected without opposition in most parts of France. No clear division of functions between the Chambers and the FNSEA has yet been made, but so long as Blondelle remains president of both organisms, there should be no problem of rivalry.

²⁰ Such a proposal was advanced in the FNSEA's 1952 congress (Monde, Feb. 1, 1952). Blondelle had hinted at the same thing in the 1949 congress.

Growers' Association. The proposal split the Rightist leadership in the FNSEA. President Blondelle himself opposed the malthusian thesis, which was also vigorously fought by Philippe Lamour and the Leftist minority. Together, the Blondelle and Lamour factions have been able to keep the CGA officially committed to expansionism, but there is increasing unrest in some farm circles.²¹

Differences continue to exist, then, at the top of the CGA. To what extent do these differences reflect similar cleavages within the farm population as a whole? This is perhaps the most significant question which must be answered in assessing the future of agrarian syndicalism in France. CGA officials like to proclaim that "the peasantry is less divided than its leaders"²²; and some observers even claim to detect the growth of a sense of class solidarity among the peasants analogous to that which inspires the city workers.²³ If this viewpoint is valid—if there is really a rising sense of unity and class-consciousness at the base—then the feuds in the CGA are mere temporary aberrations which will pass in time.

The loudest exponents of the opposite viewpoint are the Communists. For several years they have been asserting that the rural population is deeply divided along social and economic lines, and that the CGA has cut itself off from the mass of small farmers by adopting policies dictated by the large capitalist operators. So clear is this class bias, say the Communists, that the small farmers have been abandoning the CGA in droves. They point out that some departmental units of the FNSEA have become mere skeletons; that 22 of the 90 departmental sections were denied voting rights in the 1950 congress for inability to pay their national dues, and that 19 of these 22 departments were located south of the Loire, where small farming is most general, and where farm incomes are relatively low.²⁴

There is some real evidence, and much superficial evidence, to support the Communist case. The dominant element in the FNSEA is undoubtedly conservative in its political and social ideology; it is strongly attracted to corpora-

²¹ See P. Drouin in Le Monde, April 13, 1951. The CGA officially favors the creation of a "green pool" in Europe to provide a common market for agricultural products. It has also supported the Schuman Plan for a coal and steel pool. On the other hand, CGA leaders boast that they were instrumental in blocking a Franco-Italian customs union somewhat similar to Benelux. Italian competition, they insist, would ruin many French farmers unless food-importing countries could also be brought into the union.

tist doctrines, and to the idea that social stability is more important than productivity or material well-being. Within the FNSEA, the influence of a few dynamic leaders representing the specialized associations balances, and perhaps even outweighs, the influence of those delegates who represent the individual peasants. Furthermore, the greatest decline in FNSEA membership since 1947 has occurred in small-farming regions with a Leftist tradition, and in part has reflected dissatisfaction with FNSEA leadership.

Even so, it is a gross oversimplification to reduce the cleavages within the peasantry to a simple two-way pattern of class struggle, and to interpret the CGA's record according to that pattern. It is easy to show that small and middle farmers are in the majority in the national councils of the CGA and the FNSEA, and that large capitalist operators like Blondelle and Deleau are the exception rather than the rule.²⁵ True, the Communists argue that these small farmers are the prisoners or the henchmen of their big colleagues, but such an argument is more convenient than convincing. Political and social conservatism are by no means monopolies of the big owners. It can be proved, too, that the sharp decline in FNSEA membership has other causes than the small farmers' revolt against the national leadership. Alongside small-farming departments where the FNSEA is moribund, one can find other departments of similar social structure with vigorous and sizeable FNSEA units.²⁶ Where syndicalism has decayed, the cause has often been apathetic leadership or bitter political squabbles. Finally, it ought to be said on behalf of the FNSEA leadership that its record has not been one of pure reaction or of the cynical defense of big agrarian interests at the expense of the small peasantry. Some of the FNSEA and CGA leaders are sincerely concerned with the small farmer's problems, not only for the sake of social stability but also from a sense of obligation to the largest group in their "trade union."²⁷

In FNSEA congresses, there was some discrimination against populous but poor departments prior to 1947. Representation then was based on a combination of membership and total value of farm production in a department. Thus, Seine-et-Marne with only 7,448 farmers had three delegates, and Ariège with 19,106 farmers had only two. Since 1947, representation has been based on membership alone; this democratic gesture has been partially nullified by allotting 76 delegates to the specialized associations.

²⁷ The CGA's program to aid the small peasants has both progressive and regressive aspects. In the latter category one might classify the CGA's constant efforts to keep farm taxes low. In 1950 Blondelle boasted that the number of peasants subject to the agricultural profits tax had been cut from a million and a half to 593,000, thanks to the CGA's

Nevertheless, it must be admitted that peasant unity is still a slogan and a myth rather than a reality. The basic weakness of agrarian syndicalism in France lies in the nation's complex agrarian structure—in the varied social and economic status of the farmers, made still more complicated by a wide and deep variety of political traditions. On almost every practical or doctrinal issue which the CGA must face, the interests of various farm groups are bound to diverge and conflict. Thus, for example, small farmers will often benefit by regional price variations, while large producers are likely to prefer a uniform national price high enough to let most marginal peasants survive. Or, again, the interests of one wine-producing region may clash sharply with those of another area. The urban workers constitute a fairly coherent class, but the rural world, like the bourgeoisie, is made up of a whole congeries of classes.²⁸ And each of these rural classes is further divided by a varying religious and political heritage.

Agrarian syndicalism is likely to be hampered for years to come by the diversity of the base upon which it rests. It will be weakened, too, so long as the purpose of syndicalism remains controversial. For most peasants, its raison d'être is the defense of farm interests against those of rival social groups.²⁹ For a few of the more far-sighted farmers, and for many CGA leaders, its most important function is to educate and to modernize, not merely to defend what exists. Defense alone may mean stagnation; but education is likely to be a painful and unpopular process, for it may require the conversion of many farms to new types of production, and the disappearance of many marginal peasants. Even those CGA officials who believe that French agriculture must be thoroughly shaken up, and that "there are a million peasants too many" on the land, dare not say so openly.³⁰ When demagogues of Left and Right stand ready to distort any reform proposal, it is safer for syndical leaders to take a demalobbying (Libération Paysanne, May 4, 1950). On the other hand, the CGA has sponsored a number of constructive projects designed to aid small farmers in technically backward areas, for example, to furnish them with selected seed at low prices.

gogic line themselves, and to declaim loudly that they are the best defenders of what exists.

Some of the more severe critics of the CGA believe that the organization has no real authority over its members, and that it is doomed to extinction or disintegration.²¹ It is futile, they contend, to preserve the appearances of unity when irreconcilable diversity is the basic fact. The critics disagree, however, in predicting the future character of farmers' organizations. Most of them believe that the technical associations such as the cooperatives and the mutual aid societies have an assured future, no matter what happens to the CGA. Pure syndicalism, however, as represented by the FNSEA, is on shakier ground. Some prophets expect it to wither away at the local and departmental levels, and to survive only as a central coordinating agency for the various specialized associations. Others hold that the FNSEA should disappear entirely after it has served its purpose (which, as they see it, is to build a solid structure of cooperatives and mutual aid societies throughout France). Still others suggest that some new semi-public organization with official status and with an assured income from taxes (such as the recently-revived Chambers of Agriculture) may gradually take over the FNSEA's functions. Some FNSEA leaders, on the other hand, seem to envisage a powerful quasi-corporative structure through a kind of fusion of the Chambers and the FNSEA.

The future form of agrarian syndicalism, then, is obscure, but the survival of one or more mass movements to represent the farmers seems certain. Divided though the peasantry may be, there is a new self-consciousness in the French rural districts which is likely to grow in strength and to manifest itself in some institutional form. Traditionally, the peasants have been aggressively independent and impervious to organization. But the idea is rapidly spreading that they have too long been the passive objects of government and of economic forces. In a variety of ways, and for a variety of ends, they are determined to share actively in shaping their own destiny. The spirit in which they use this new self-consciousness, and the kind of leadership which they can produce and are willing to follow, will do much to shape the course of the Fourth Republic.

²¹ See, for example, R. Cercler, loc. cit., pp. 276-77; and J. François in Cahiers du clergé rural, March, 1951, pp. 122-23. On the other hand, N. Drogat in Revue de l'Action Populaire, Vol. 43, pp. 572-73 (Nov., 1950), holds that the CGA has a great educational role to play, and that it may survive not as a mass organization but as an agency grouping the rural elite. Most of the views about the CGA's future summarized in this paragraph were gathered in conversations with syndical and cooperative officials in Paris and the provinces.

AN AMERICAN VIEW OF EUROPEAN UNION*

ARTHUR N. HOLCOMBE

Harvard University

The official American policy regarding a United Europe has developed rapidly since the end of World War II and has already gone far toward committing the United States to the establishment of a European Union of some kind. The first important overt act in this development was the declaration of policy in the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948. One purpose of this legislation, Congress declared, was "to encourage these countries [that is, European participants in the Marshall Plan] through a joint organization to exert sustained common efforts as set forth in the report of the Committee on European Economic Cooperation, signed at Paris on September 22, 1947." With this encouragement the Organization for European Economic Cooperation was soon effected. The next step was to extend the area of American interest from the economic to the military field. One of the purposes of the Mutual Defense Assistance Act of 1949 was "to achieve international peace and security through the United Nations so that armed force shall not be used except in the common interest." This legislation led eventually to the effort to organize a European Defense Community capable of playing an important role in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. A further step was the Mutual Security Act of 1951, which declared American policy to be "to further encourage the economic unification and the political federation of Europe." Thus the American government finally became involved in the projected establishment of a constitution for a United States of Europe.

This was a bold undertaking. Englishmen, Frenchmen, Germans, Italians, and others, whom Americans are too prone to call Europeans without adequate evidence that such is in fact their proper political classification, were quick to point out what seemed to them the fallacy of the simple and naive belief that, because a few isolated American states were able to form a useful and durable federal union a century and a half ago, it would be feasible to repeat the performance in modern Europe. Important advantages possessed by eighteenth-century Americans could not be expected to recur in twentieth-century Europe. In the first place, Americans had become accustomed to the idea of union through long association in a common subjection to Great Britain. Englishmen, Frenchmen, Germans, et al., unhappily were more accustomed to fighting one another than to united action for any but the most trivial purposes. Moreover, the secrecy with which the proceedings of the Federal Convention of 1787 were conducted had facilitated the process of reconciling their conflicting economic and political interests by acceptable compromises. Such secrecy would be impossible under the changed technological conditions of modern times. Further, the draft of a Constitution, which the Convention of 1787 eventually produced though not without overcoming many obstacles, was referred for final adoption to special conventions in the states, which could act more independently and rationally than the regular legislative bodies many of whose members would have been influenced by adverse interests of their own. A draft European constitution would have to be submitted to national parliaments with at least equally important adverse interests among their members. These procedural difficulties alone, to say nothing about the more substantial differences between eighteenth-century Americans and twentieth-century Europeans, promised no easy triumph for the new American policy.

To an American, who observes the contemporary European political scene with a reflective eye, the case for federal union in Europe naturally seems strong. In his own country the federal system has eased the transition from a loose confederation of imperfectly assorted states without an effective general government to a tight union with a strong national government and an illogical but not too inconvenient set of decentralized institutions for administering local affairs. What Americans continue to call their federal union is a political structure that is radically different from what originally passed under that name, but it still serves to combine in an acceptable and serviceable form the solid advantages of local self-government in matters of primarily local concern with those of a vigorous central authority in greater matters. A political principle which has served Americans so well, it is easy to conclude, should be useful also in an area like Europe, where there is obvious need for the greater centralization of political power and equally manifest reluctance to jeopardize established systems of local and territorial self-government. Nothing seems more timely and reasonable than a convention, like that in Philadelphia one hundred and sixty-six years ago, to form a more perfect union of the European states, or at least of such of them as do not fall within the sphere of influence of the Soviet Union.

Why can't Europeans follow where Americans have already shown the way? It is evident that the difficulties are greater than those so happily overcome by the American founding fathers. Doubtless the foremost difficulty is the scarcity of Europeans in the political sense of the term. There are of course plenty of people on European soil to provide the material for a European federal union of high political potential. The six states, which have within a year successfully formed the Coal and Steel Community Organization, comprise a population approximately equal to that of the United States, and, if able to join in a viable federal union, would constitute a powerful body politic. But it is easier for Frenchmen, Germans, and Italians, Belgians, Hollanders, and Luxemburgers, to say nothing of others, to behave like Americans, after a few years on American soil, than to behave like Europeans in their native habitat. The mystic chords of memory, to borrow Lincoln's fine phrase, which bind native-born Americans to their ancestral country, may not add much to the strength of the pragmatic bonds of shared hope, which tie the immigrant to the land of his adoption. But at least national sentiments are not forces of disunion as in Europe. A Frenchman's or a German's intellect may bid him press forward with schemes for European Union, but his heart will hold him back. It is not enough to convince him by rational argument that he should behave like a European; it is necessary also to put him in the right mood for such behavior.

There is another hard question, the answer to which Americans could take for granted, but for which the advocates of federal union in Europe must find an answer. What are the states which should join in forming a European federal union? That is to say, for the purposes of European federation what is Europe? It takes no more than a quick glance at a good map to see that some parts of Western Europe are naturally adapted to a much closer relationship than is possible under the existing system of independent national states. Somewhere about the mouths of the Rhine, for instance, there should be a great sea-port to serve the needs of the rich hinterland drained by that historic stream. Nature seems to have intended that the greatest port in Europe should spring to life in that highly favored region. But unnatural political boundaries stand in the way. No American tourist can drive his car across the German frontier at any point between the Swiss border and the North Sea without feeling keenly the absurdity of such artificial barriers to good neighborly living. Nor can one drive across the French border anywhere between Basle and Dunkirk without forming a strong conviction that this political boundary also is ill-suited to the requirements of strong and prosperous independent statehood under the developing economic conditions of our time.

The case for a federal union of at least France, Germany, and the Low Countries is supported by economic considerations of the most urgent and compelling kind. It is not equally clear what other European countries should be included within a federation organized primarily for economic reasons. Consider, for instance, the case for the inclusion of Great Britain in such a federation. The British have certainly some important common interests with their neighbors directly across the Channel and North Sea, but they also have interests overseas which they do not share with Continental Europeans, and which strengthen the sense of independence derived from their insular position. It is the Italians who have been quickest to see substantial advantages to their country in joining a federal union which would include also France and Germany. A land with a shortage of coal and iron and a surplus of labor obviously stands to gain much from the establishment of a union which would assure better access to supplies of the essential raw materials of modern industry and better opportunities of employment for its unnaturally depressed workers. The Scandinavian states, on the other hand, appear to have less to gain from joining a West European Federation which, while lowering the barriers to trade with their neighbors to the south, might raise new obstacles to trade with good customers and suppliers in the British Isles. Spain and Portugal, and also Greece and Turkey, to say nothing of the countries behind the Iron Curtain, have economic interests of their own which, like those of the Scandinavian states, make the case for a federal union on economic grounds less urgent and compelling than it must seem to the peoples of the nuclear group of states in the middle of Western Europe.

Yet there are persuasive economic reasons for a broadly planned European Union of some kind. General Marshall's original offer of economic aid, contingent upon a beginning of closer union among the European states, brought an immediate response, not only from the eligible states of Western Europe, but also from some of those farther east within the sphere of influence of the Soviet Union. The resulting Organization for European Economic Cooperation, despite its name, eventually left a large part of Europe outside its membership, but its history clearly demonstrated that no narrow concept of Europe can satisfy all the needs which help to create the current demand for some sort of European Union. The OEEC proved to be the most comprehensive European community organization which it has been possible to establish up to now. It included besides the British Isles and Iceland all the West European states except Spain together with Austria in Central Europe and also Greece and Turkey in the Southeast. But the actual membership of the OEEC manifestly did not supply a definitive answer to the basic question, what is Europe for purposes of federal union.

Among Europeans the foremost advocate of European Union since World War II is generally considered to have been Winston Churchill. His key-note speech at Zurich in 1946 made an impact on European political thinking even greater than that of his "iron curtain" speech in the same year at Fulton, Missouri, on the political thought of Americans. Churchill was undoubtedly the most outstanding political figure at the Amsterdam Congress in May, 1948, where the nascent European Movement put in train the course of events which culminated in the establishment of the Council of Europe at Strasbourg a year later. Leading continental advocates of European Union were greatly disappointed that the British Labour Government, then in power, was unwilling to cooperate in establishing as powerful an organization at Strasbourg as they desired and, but for the reluctance of the British, could probably have brought into being. Later, when Churchill returned to power at Westminster, high hopes were formed of the help to be received from him in strengthening the Council of Europe and making it better able to accomplish the purposes of its creators. But these hopes were disappointed and Churchill's credit among European Unionists was badly damaged.

Closer attention to Churchill's speeches on the subject of European Union might have prevented some of the unhappy disillusionment with his leadership of the European Movement. Speaking on May 14, 1947, at a United Europe meeting in London,¹ he clearly indicated his point of view. "There are several important bodies," he observed, "which are working for the federation of the European States and for the creation of a Federal Constitution for Europe." And he immediately added: "I hope that may eventually be achieved." But he had yet to indicate the role of the British in such an undertaking. "It is not for us at this stage," he declared, "to attempt to define or prescribe the structure of constitutions. We ourselves are content, in the first instance, to present the idea of United Europe, in which our country will play a decisive part, as a moral, cultural and spiritual conception to which all can rally without being disturbed by divergencies about structure." When he reached the question, what are the political and physical boundaries of the United Europe you are trying to create, he refused to face the problem of determining which countries should be included and which should be left out. "It is not our task or wish to draw frontier lines," he exclaimed, "but rather to smoothe them away."

But Churchill did make clear his profound conviction that the idea of European Union must be subordinated to the grander conception of world government. "We do not of course pretend that United Europe provides the final and complete solution to all the problems of international relationships. The creation of an authoritative, all-powerful world order is the ultimate aim towards which we must strive. Unless some effective World Super-Government can be set up and brought quickly into action, the prospects for peace and human progress are dark and doubtful." To make his meaning doubly clear he took pains to describe the relationship of Britain to Europe more precisely. "We accept without question the world supremacy of the United Nations Organization. In the Constitution agreed upon at San Francisco direct provision was made for regional organisations to be formed. United Europe will form one major Regional entity. There is the United States with all its dependencies; there is the Soviet Union; there is the British Empire and Commonwealth; and there is Europe, with which Great Britain is profoundly blended. Here are the four main pillars of the world Temple of Peace." Was Great Britain to figure at the same time and in the same way as material for two of these main pillars? Churchill did not say.

In his great speech before the Congress of Europe at The Hague, May 7, 1948,² Churchill was more precise. "We aim," he asserted, "at the eventual participation of all European peoples whose society and way of life . . . are not in disaccord with a Charter of Human Rights and with the sincere expression of free democracy." He now thought that the governments of the countries which had become associated for the purposes of the Marshall Plan could most conveniently take the lead in planning definite arrangements. He still insisted that nothing should be done which would conflict with the paramount authority of a world organization of the United Nations. On the contrary, he declared, "a Council of Europe was a subordinate but necessary part of the world organisation." As for the relations between the British and the Continental peoples who would join in a United Europe, Churchill reminded his audience that "we in Britain must move in harmony with our great partners in the Commonwealth, . . . undue precipitancy . . . would hinder and not help the immediate mission we have to fulfill."

It was evident that Churchill was thinking of United Europe as a European Defense Community rather than as an Economic and Social Welfare Community, and that he was reserving a more independent role for Great Britain as head of the British Commonwealth than would be practicable or proper for the democracies on the European Continent. He still clung to his concept of regional organizations as necessary pillars of a world organization for peace. "We must do our best to create and combine the great regional unities which it is in our power to influence, and we must endeavor by patient and faithful service to prepare for the day when there will be an effective world government resting upon the main groupings of mankind." Advocates of European Union were plainly put on notice that Churchill's dominating purpose was the organization, not merely of Europeans, but above all of mankind.

The meaning of Churchill's speech was not lost upon his listeners. Those who advocated the immediate creation of at least a European customs union, if not a genuine political federation, realized that they could not count upon his aid. Accepting the view that any form of constitutional or organized union was impracticable, and that close consultation between governments was the most that could be hoped for at that time, the leaders of the Congress of Europe at The Hague consented to settle for the comparatively modest scheme embodied a year later in the Council of Europe. This embryonic European Union was established with a roving Committee of Ministers without executive power and a Consultative Assembly at Strasbourg without legislative power. Such a purely deliberative Assembly, Churchill contended, in a speech delivered towards the end of 1948 at a United Europe Exhibition in London,³ would not develop into an irresponsible talking shop, as many of his associates in the European Movement feared. On the contrary, he assured his friends, "The Assembly will perform an essential task and one which cannot be performed by governments; the task of creating a European public opinion and a sense of solidarity among the peoples of Europe." But obviously Churchill was losing his earlier interest in European Union, as the danger of aggression from the East grew more menacing and urgent, and turning his attention toward new plans for a defense organization originating beyond the Atlantic.

The organizers of the Council of Europe were unable to persuade all the European states belonging to the Organization for European Economic Cooperation to join the new organization. Eighteen countries, if West Germany, Austria, and Trieste may be so described, eventually became active members of the OEEC, but only fourteen of them have been represented in the Consultative Assembly of the Council of Europe at Strasbourg. Austria and Trieste lacked the necessary political independence, Portugal was not wanted, and Switzerland wished to preserve the appearance of neutrality. Meanwhile American statesmen had conceived the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to supplement, and eventually to supplant, the OEEC, and friends of European Union, who regarded a European Defense Community as more urgent than a European Economic and Social Welfare Community, under whatever name, were bound, like Churchill, to shift their interest from the economic and social to the military reasons for a Union of Europe. The organizers of NATO, however, were not even able to persuade all the European states belonging to the Council of Europe to join the new organization. The Federal Republic of Germany was ineligible, Ireland was uninterested, and Sweden deemed it prudent to abstain. The only additional state gained for the new organization was Portugal. In the nature of things, nevertheless, such advocates of a United Europe as Churchill, like the Americans, threw their support to the new and more vigorous organization.

The history of the Council of Europe⁴ has been a history of constant struggle between the Committee of Ministers, seeking to keep the Consultative Assembly within the narrow limits prescribed by its original constitution, and the majority of the Assembly, seeking to obtain for that impotent body some genuine legislative powers. The struggle has been unequal. More powers could not be obtained for the Assembly except at the cost of losing some of its members; none of its members could be spared, if the Assembly was to perform its essential task, the promotion of West European solidarity. The greatest obstacle to the strengthening of the Assembly's powers was the reluctance of the British Labour Government to involve itself more deeply in the political affairs of the Continent. It could not find a suitable adjustment between its traditional obligations to its old associates overseas in the Commonwealth and its growing responsibilities to its new associates in the Council of Europe across the Channel. The Scandinavian states were unwilling to abandon Britain, with which they were connected by important ties. The minor states on the Continent, particularly Belgium and the Netherlands, were unready to face their more powerful neighbors, France and Germany, in an Assembly possessing important law-making authority without a third major power to hold the balance between these two powers. Frenchmen and Germans, however eager they might be to bury the past and turn toward a brighter future together, could not form an acceptable federal union by themselves alone.

It is not surprising that the advocates of a United Europe should seek escape from their dilemma by trying a new approach to the problem of European federation. In the Spring of 1950 the harbinger of a new phase in the organization of Europe appeared in the form of the Schuman Plan. A beginning was to be made without further delay by bringing together the states which had the most to gain by forming a single joint organization to govern the production of coal and steel and a single common market to regulate their sale and distribution. The formation of a Coal and Steel Community would be a functional approach to the problem of European federation. The successful formation of such a community might be expected to attract other European states. Likewise, the approval of the method might be expected to lead to the formation of other functional communities among them. In fact the aggression upon the Korean Republic shortly after the publication of the Schuman Plan and the menace of further aggression elsewhere led immediately to the proposal of the Plevin Plan for a European Defense Community. It was clear that plans for other functional organizations would follow and that, if they should be adopted, the necessity for their coordination by some suitable political agency would eventually lead to a genuine federal union of the European states belonging to these various community organizations.⁵

The triumph of the functional approach to the problem of European federal union was facilitated by the attitude of Churchill. When he became Prime Minister for the second time in October, 1951, European federalists looked to his new Government for more constructive cooperation than they had received from the Labour Government. They did not get it. The new British Government was manifestly more interested in the development of a European Army under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and was not disposed to become involved in the efforts by Continental statesmen to transform the Council of Europe into a genuine federal union. British statesmen vigorously supported American efforts to strengthen NATO, while the West European leaders resolved to push on with the Schuman Plan and other proposals for the organization of special limited-purpose communities, regardless of the stand-offishness of the British. The Schuman Plan was duly ratified by the nuclear group of states, and the organization of the European Coal and Steel Community was completed in the Summer of 1952. The High Authority, which was to serve as the executive of the new Community, established its headquarters at Luxembourg, and the Common Assembly shared the facilities of the Council of Europe at Strasbourg. It was a modest but auspicious beginning of the federalization of what European federalists liked to call "Little Europe."

The European federalist leaders, particularly Spaak of Belgium, the most active and influential member of the Council of Europe's Consultative Assembly, Foreign Minister Schuman of France, who maintained the cause of European Union through a long succession of French ministries, Chancellor Adenauer of the West German Republic, who staked the life of his Government on the issue of European Union, and Prime Minister De Gasperi of Italy, who persistently asserted the claims of his country to an equal place in any European federal union, skillfully utilized the interest of British and also American statesmen in one of the plans for a special limited-purpose community, namely, that for a European Defense Community, to exploit the functional approach to the formation of a more perfect European Union. This plan was of the greatest importance to the sponsors of NATO, since it was designed for the purpose of integrating German forces into a West European army. The same group of nuclear states, which formed the Coal and Steel Community, were to be the original members of the European Defense Community. The plan further called for the establishment of a parallel set of institutions, a Common Assembly to meet at Strasbourg, an executive organized like the High Authority of the Coal and Steel Community, and a court which might be identical with that of the Coal and Steel Community. The Defense Community would need much more money than the Coal and Steel Community, but in general its structure and procedures would be similar.

⁵ For a scholarly account of these developments, see Clarence C. Walton, "The Fate of Neo-Federalism in Western Europe," The Western Political Quarterly, Vol. 5, pp. 366-90 (Sept., 1952).

The master-stroke of the federalist leaders was the insertion of a provision in the Defense Community plan authorizing its Assembly, as soon as it should be organized, to prepare a plan for organizing a European Political Community with power to coordinate the Coal and Steel Community and Defense Community organizations, together with any other special limited-purpose community organizations that might be established. Such a coordinating agency would necessarily be a genuine federal union of "Little Europe" with a population at the beginning not inferior to that of the United States, and with good prospects of eventually attracting additional members until it should become a veritable West European federal union. Such a federal union the British might not wish to join, but certainly they would hesitate to put obstacles in its way in pursuance of their alleged traditional policy of keeping Europe divided in the interest of a successful balance of power.

The interest of the six nuclear states in a European Defense Community is not necessarily identical with that of its principal sponsors. British and American statesmen doubtless are primarily concerned to make a show of organized force great enough to deter the Soviet Union and her satellites and associates from beginning a third world war. But they also wish to create a military establishment strong enough to help win such a war, if unhappily it should occur. The governments which have been in power in the nuclear group of West European states certainly have shared the first of these objectives. It is not so clear that they or their successors are or will be equally devoted to the second. There is undoubtedly a substantial body of opinion in the countries which suffered most cruelly in World War II that another world war would be a greater evil than the anticipated alternative of subjection to the aggressor, costly and painful as such subjection might prove to be. There is perhaps an even greater body of opinion which is willing to support a policy of well-organized rearmament for the purpose of intimidating possible aggressors, but which deliberately refuses to consider a present choice of alternatives in anticipation of the event that the policy of organized intimidation should fail to preserve peace. It is not surprising that even within the nuclear group of West European states there should be more opposition to the proposed European Defense Community than to the plan for a Coal and Steel Community.

The European federalist leaders shrewdly resolved not to let their plan for establishing a genuine Federal Union of "Little Europe" remain contingent upon the prompt organization of the proposed European Defense Community. As soon as the Coal and Steel Community Organization was established, the Committee of Ministers invited the Common Assembly to create a special Constituent Assembly, consisting of its own members together with three additional representatives of the French, German, and Italian Governments, respectively, for the purpose of preparing a plan for a European Political Community.⁶ This special Constituent Assembly was to be further strengthened by the admission of observers from states belonging to the Council of Europe but not to the Coal and Steel Community. The original purpose of this procedure was to avoid the delay which would ensue if the charter for the European Political Community were to be framed in accordance with the provisions in the plan for the European Defense Community. It was fortunate that this more expeditious procedure was adopted. In some respects the plan for the European Defense Community had been less carefully prepared than that for the Coal and Steel Community. Controversies over details of the plan, and growing differences over the relations to be established between the armed forces to be put under the control of the Defense Community and those to remain under the control of its member states, caused unexpected delay in the ratification of the Defense Community Treaty. It began to seem likely that, instead of the European Defense Community becoming one of the pillars of the European Political Community, the latter would pave the way for the Defense Community.

At the present writing the plan for the European Political Community is in process of preparation. The special Constituent Assembly was directed to report a draft in March of the present year as a basis for further proceedings. The draft was duly reported and was obviously the product of many compromises. There are still many difficulties to be overcome, many conflicting interests to be reconciled. It is of course possible that the obstacles will prove insurmountable at this time. The vagaries of French politics are unpredictable. General elections in Germany and Italy may bring radical changes in the political scene. It is enough to observe that the drive for the establishment of a genuine Federal Union of "Little Europe" enjoys the good will of all the members of the Council of Europe and has developed greater momentum than seemed possible only a short time ago.

The attitude of the British Government toward the unexpected turn in the road to European Union gave deep concern to the European federalist leaders. Since the British would not participate in the formation of a more perfect Union of West European states, it would have to choose between benevolent non-participation and obstruction. There were fears that the latter policy might prevail at Westminster, even under a Government headed by Churchill. The traditional British policy toward the Continent had seemed to favor the multiplication, or at least the preservation, of independent sovereign states, regardless of inconvenient boundaries or irrational economic systems, in order to facilitate the management of the balance of power. Churchill apparently had lost interest in the obsolete system of a European balance of power, but would his Government actively support federalist efforts to organize a United States of Europe, or such part of it as might be capable of organization at this time? Or would the Conservative Government under his leadership put further difficulties in the way of the European federalists, in addition to the immediate difficulty resulting from the absence of a Great Power widely regarded as an almost indispensable component of a well-balanced and stable federal union which would include the major Continental powers? Happily from the European federalists' viewpoint the Churchill Government decided to cooperate with the Coal and Steel Community, and also with the special Constituent Assembly, as closely as possible without compromising its own constitutional freedom of action.

The American attitude has always given less concern to European federalists. Certainly the policy of the government at Washington to encourage the further unification of Europe had been made plain at every convenient opportunity. In the Autumn of 1951 the Congress had gone so far as to authorize a conference of Senators and Representatives with the Council of Europe at Strasbourg. A frank and interesting discussion took place in November between a strong Congressional delegation and a representative delegation from the Consultative Assembly.⁷ But earlier there had been some misgivings concerning the possible reaction of American statesmen to European Union. Churchill himself had confessed in his keynote speech in the 1948 Congress of Europe at The Hague that he had been anxious at first lest the United States of America should view with hostility the idea of a United States of Europe. It may have been that he suspected the development of an attitude across the Atlantic, since the United States had become a major world power with a special responsibility for the maintenance of world peace, similar to that in Churchill's own country during the long period when it had accepted a major responsibility for the maintenance of peace through the manipulation of the balance of power. But he rejoiced, he was quick to declare on that occasion, "that the great Republic had risen far above such moods."

The immediate problem of American policy is not to decide whether to support or oppose the further unification of Europe, but rather how far to go in trying to influence the nature and extent of a European Union. When Paul G. Hoffman was speaking for the United States as head of ECA, he seized every convenient occasion to point out the economic advantages of a common market for at least that part of Europe that had joined in the Organization for European Economic Cooperation. When General Eisenhower was speaking for the United States as head of SHAPE, he was equally diligent in pointing out the advantages of an organized European Political Community in order to provide for the common defense of Western Europe. In a well-publicized speech before the English-Speaking Union in London on July 3, 1951, he associated himself explicitly with the Churchillian approach to European unity. "Winston Churchill's plea for a United Europe," he declared, "can yet bear such greatness of fruit that it may well be remembered as the most notable achievement of a career marked by achievement." Eisenhower was also truly Churchillian in his devotion to the cause. "The difficulties of integrating Western Europe," he conceded, "appear staggering to those who live by ritual"; but he presumably did not live by ritual. Be that as it may, the difficulties did not stagger him.

The plan for forming a European Political Union, incorporated in the European Defense Community Treaty, signed at Paris, May 27, 1952, provided that the Union should be a federal union and that its frame of government should be based upon the principle of the separation of powers and should include a bicameral legislature. All of these provisions might eventually have been adopted without any advice from Americans, but American influence undoubtedly helped to secure their acceptance at that time. The official spokesmen for the American policy toward European Union seemed to be committing themselves to the project of a West European constitutional convention for the purpose of doing for Western Europe what the Federal Convention at Philadelphia in 1787 had done for the United States. This did not prevent putting the influence of American representatives in NATO behind the functional approach to the problem of uniting Europe, when the prospects for that kind of approach began to seem brighter than for the more generalized political approach. The improving outlook for the adoption of the Schuman Plan for a Coal and Steel Community naturally increased American interest in schemes for building a European political community upon the foundation of a number of limited-purpose and limited-membership functional communities.

It is easy to conclude that American interests will be best served by the adoption of a permanent constitution for a European Federal Union, based as far as possible on approved American principles of constitutional government, and that American influence in Europe should be exerted to the utmost to bring such a European Union into existence. But such a conclusion disregards some important considerations. One is, that the approved American principles of government give no answer to the question, what European countries should be included in the United States of Europe. Particularly, should Great Britain be included, as most Continental federalists would prefer? Or should a beginning be made with the West European states which have already formed the Coal and Steel Community, in accordance with the plans of the functionalists who now control the European Movement and are taking the lead in the work of the provisional Constituent Assembly?

Another important consideration is, that the democratic monarchies and republics of Western Europe have developed some principles of government of their own to which their peoples have grown accustomed and in which they have greater confidence than in principles developed across the Atlantic. The European arrangements for distributing the executive power between kings (or republican presidents) and ministers, for distributing the legislative power between ministers and parliaments, and for utilizing political parties as instruments of representative government, differ greatly from the corresponding arrangements in the American system of government. In the United States there is constitutional government and there is also party government, and the relations between the two are important but obscure. Recent legislation designed to ensure that presidential electors will vote for the regular candidates of the parties whose nominations they seek raised questions of constitutional law which only the Supreme Court could decide, and some of its judges thought they were decided wrongly. The theory of party government is by no means generally understood. In Europe the importance of party government has long been recognized and legislation designed to preserve and extend the role of the parties in the governmental process has long been accepted, as is plainly indicated by long-continued experiments with partisan election laws and proportional representation. The American system of bi-partisan politics is not for export to the Continent of Europe.

A federal constitution is not only a written description of a scheme of government for a group of states, but also a kind of treaty of peace between the states providing systematic arrangements for elaborating the terms of the peace settlement and ensuring their enforcement. The process of constitution-making resembles in many ways the process of treaty-making. Good treaties are those which confer mutually acceptable and lasting advantages upon all parties to them. They can only be made with the concurrence of the parties themselves. It is still true, as Washington declared long ago, that "Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation." The details of a European federal constitution, as well as the determination of the states which shall be parties to such a constitution, must be left to the decision of those primarily concerned, if the business of constitution-making is to prosper. Up to now the West European federalists have managed their affairs with impressive skill and assiduity. Success, though in the nature of things uncertain, and in a quieter age perhaps unlikely, is in these unsettled times a reasonably promising political speculation.⁸

Winston Churchill, speaking originally for himself alone but implicitly for the Government which he now heads, defined an attitude toward European Union which deserves the closest attention of American policy-makers. It was a consummation devoutly to be wished, he believed, which might well be encouraged by the British Government in all convenient ways not compromising British independence. But it was not to be regarded as a final end of British policy. It was rather as an integral part of a larger scheme for world organization that European Federation stirred his imagination and found a place in his program for political action. The great dominant purpose of his political planning was the preservation of international peace through the universal reign of law. A general international organization for this purpose would in his judgment be stronger and more serviceable if there were a suitable European Union capable of functioning as one of its supporting pillars, than if the West European states remained divided against themselves. Nevertheless, he wished above all, as he expressed it at The Hague in 1948, "to prepare for the day when there will be an effective world government resting upon the main groupings of mankind."

American policy toward European Union has run a logical course. First, the objective was economic recovery, and incidentally such a degree of European Union as might be helpful to that end. The next objective was military strength, and therefore a closer union of such portion of Europe as might be persuaded to unite in order to provide for the common defense. This, however cannot be a final end of American interest in European Union. American commitments to encourage the political federation of Europe have been made in pursuance of an ulterior purpose which happens to have been suitably expressed by Winston Churchill. Nothing short of making the United Nations Organization itself strong enough to keep the peace can be accepted as the logical fulfillment of the American policy of encouraging European Union. The export of the principle of federalism can not stop until its use has been extended to an organized world.

POLITICAL FACTORS IN U. S. INTERNATIONAL FINANCIAL COOPERATION, 1945-1950

JACK N. BEHRMAN

Washington & Lee University

International cooperation through multilateral organizations sharply distinguishes the post-World War II economic policies of the United States from those it employed following World War I. After World War I, the United States eschewed any form of international economic organization, which some governments thought should be continued; early in the more recent conflict, United States officials pressed hard for the acceptance of world-wide institutional cooperation. The purpose of the present article is to review, through an examination of its policy toward multilateral financial arrangements, some of the important discussions and decisions which moved the United States towards internationalism in economic relations; to emphasize the role of political factors in the development of financial organizations, in the retreat from international "democracy," and in the growth of regional cooperation; and to examine some of the difficulties of international financial cooperation.¹

A primary objective of the United States government's postwar policy preparations was the re-creation of a method of conducting international economic transactions which would not result in economic warfare; the major technique was that of international agreement on accepted rules for conducting transactions. Government officials considered that this approach was not only desirable but also possible, in view of the success of wartime collaboration. Administration officials were so determined to take advantage of wartime cooperative attitudes that they set about, even during the war, to obtain agreement among the United Nations on the international administration of relief assistance, on a short-term exchange balancing mechanism, and on an agency to make loans for reconstruction and development. This early emphasis on obtaining international agreement stemmed from the belief that it would take considerable time to develop concrete proposals and that substantial progress along these lines was a necessary part of the overall military strategy.²

² This view is well stated in the following portion of an introduction to the early proposals on the International Monetary Fund, written in 1942: "The people of the anti-Axis powers must be encouraged to feel themselves on solid international ground, they must be given to understand that a United Nations victory will not usher in another two decades of economic uneasiness, bickering, ferment, and disruption. They must be assured that something will be done in the sphere of international economic relations that is

Many official statements were made during the war and postwar periods to the effect that the postwar world had to be offered a type of international collaboration that was both "new and different." One of the main purposes of the method of international cooperation was the avoidance of economic conflicts and use of economic power for political purposes. All international organizations were to be "de-politicized," in that the use of political methods by which small countries are dominated by larger ones and the injection of political factors into what were then considered purely technical questions would be avoided. In this way, it was hoped that instead of the much discussed postwar "blocs" of nations there would emerge a more inclusive "world-wide" cooperation of the allied and associated nations.³ The new internationalism was to embrace countries of varying races, creeds, and economic and political systems. Events in the postwar period forced a reversal or modification of such ideals and policies, and led to the creation of other types of international financial cooperation which recognized the presence and force of political considerations.

I. INTERNATIONALISM: WORLD-WIDE (A-POLITICAL) COOPERATION

The world-wide (functional) approach to international financial cooperation—with an international agency responsible for coordinating members' actions in a narrow and specified field, as distinct from a regional organ performing several different functions—was first made concrete in the United Nations new, that is powerful enough and comprehensive enough to give expectation of successfully filling a world need. They must have assurance that methods and resources are being prepared to provide them with capital to help them rebuild their devastated areas, reconstruct their war-distorted economies, and help free them from the strangulating grasp of lost markets and depleted reserves. Finally, they must have assurance that the United States does not intend to desert the war-worn and impoverished nations after the war is won, but proposes to help them in the long and difficult task of economic reconstruction." (Harry D. White, "Preliminary Draft: United Nations Stabilization Fund and a Bank for Reconstruction and Development of the United and Associated Nations," U. S. Treasury Department, March, 1942, pp. 3-4. This document and some others cited infra may be found among the papers of Harry D. White, former Chief of the Division of Monetary Research and later Assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury, which have been donated to the Princeton University Library. Citations of manuscripts and documents found among these papers will hereinafter refer to White's Papers.)

Relief and Rehabilitation Administration. The experience with UNRRA provides a good example of the difficulties of intergovernmental cooperation in financial disbursements and was a prominent factor in shaping the organizational structure of cooperation in aid programs in the years 1947-1950.

The United States was greatly concerned that the provision of relief supplies (particularly food) should not be used as a political weapon by elements within the liberated and devastated countries or by neighboring countries. Administration officials based their plan for an international organization on the belief that only through multilateral responsibility could economic assistance be divorced from the political intentions of the granting and receiving nations and be administered without preference as to the political affiliation, race, or creed of recipients. In its request that Congress approve U. S. participation in UNRRA, the Administration stated that the fact that assistance was to be provided by a multi-national agency was a most important aspect of the program, since only through such an organization could this non-discriminatory end be gained. It pictured UNRRA as the initial effort towards postwar international cooperation, without whose success the future of all subsequent collaboration would be endangered: "If UNRRA should fail, there is grave doubt that any collaboration of the United Nations can survive the test of practical application."⁴

The "world-wide" character of UNRRA is evidenced by the fact that 47 nations signed the agreement in 1943, among them Russia and several of the Eastern European countries. It was precisely this world-wide character which disturbed many members of Congress, who believed that the inclusion of Russia would cause UNRRA to fail of its purpose of being politically non-discriminatory. Some of them opposed the program as likely to aid the spread of Communism by giving Russia a voice in its administration and by supplying most of its assistance to Eastern European countries. Congressional supporters of the Administration's view held that this form of international organization was the only way to familiarize peoples of various nations with each other's problems and ideas and to gain adequate spread of information whereby tolerance and peaceable relations would be maintained.⁵ Those dissatisfied with the

⁵ This viewpoint is a reflection of the Cobden-Bright idea that international contacts are the basis of knowledge which, in turn, is conducive to peace. There are some analogies between this idea and the foreign economic policy of Hull and his followers from 1934 to 1947. The principle is questionable even in conditions under which it was supposed to operate; when a nation's external relations are channeled through government agencies, whatever validity exists in the concept becomes inoperative. In 1951 a State Department official admitted that the advantage of "keeping a window open" by trade is a fiction international aspect of UNRRA argued that the U. S. government should retain full control over the relief and distribute it through the Army and Navy or the American Red Cross in order to prevent "misuse" of the funds it contributed and to gain for itself the good will resulting from aid.⁶ Such proposals were rejected, however, on the ground that, besides being the "least cost" way of providing relief since other nations would contribute, UNRRA was the first step toward a continuing international cooperation which was necessary to secure the peace.⁷

The same principle of international sharing of responsibilities, costs and risks to avoid "political" influence and tensions arising from unilateral action by one or a few nations was applied to the Bretton Woods Agreements. Under these Agreements, 44 nations contributed funds to be used in supplying short- and long-term capital to member countries for the purposes of helping to balance international payments and of hastening reconstruction and development. These institutions also were supposed to be world-wide in membership; although the Axis countries were not initial members, provision was made for their later admission. Russia attended early consultations on the Fund and Bank, and its representatives signed the Bretton Woods Agreements. The Administration stated categorically that the economic organizations were appropriate to any kind of economic or political system and that the institutions were to be "non-political," in that political relations would have no direct effect on the decisions of the agencies.⁸

when trade is conducted through state trading agencies. See Mutual Security Program Appropriations for 1952, Hearings, Part 1, House of Rep., Subcomm. of the Comm. on Appropriations, September, 1951, p. 404. In any case, no support for the idea that such cooperation leads to mutual understanding, tolerance and peace can be gained from the experience of UNRRA.

⁶ The program for government and relief in occupied areas administered by the Army and the Navy was even larger than UNRRA's. One UNRRA official has since argued that UNRRA should have been merged with the Army's program or that at least Army officers should have been assigned to important UNRRA posts to assure their cooperation and the use of their experience and knowledge, and perhaps also for political reasons. See Marvin Klemme, The Inside Story of UNRRA (New York, 1949), pp. 214-18. The Red Cross, too, could almost certainly have built up an organization as quickly as UNRRA did to handle the problem. The case for UNRRA as against the Army and Navy or the Red Cross seems to have rested almost solely on the merits of international cooperation.

⁷ United States officials were not alone in urging international financial cooperation as a means of alleviating disaster and of gaining peace. See, for example, the statement of Hugh Dalton in defending the Bretton Woods Agreements and the Anglo-American Financial Agreement, Parliamentary Debates, House of Commons, 417 H. C. Deb. 5 s, December 12, 1945, col. 443.

⁸ The question of the role of politics arose over a statement of Secretary Morgenthau before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency that the United States "has the greatest interest in seeing that international trade and investment are determined by economic and not by political considerations":

"Senator Fulbright: It occurred to me that before the war we did business with such countries as Japan and Spain without any regard to political considerations. It does not seem to me that in the future we can isolate the economic from the political; and in stating several times that this must be done on an economic basis without regard to politics, that is not quite correct. . . .

Congress, however, took a different view, and in order to assure that the foreign economic policy of the United States would be coordinated with its political policy, it established a National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems composed of Cabinet-level members (including among others the Secretaries of State, Treasury, and Commerce). The Council was charged, inter alia, with fixing United States policy in the Fund

Is not this a part of the political international arrangement?

"Mr. Morgenthau: Senator Fulbright, the discussion at Bretton Woods was based on the economic needs of a country and not on the political needs. And the thought all through the discussions was, particularly as affecting the small countries, such as Greece, Czechoslovakia—

"Senator Fulbright: And the Argentine and Spain.

"Mr. Morgenthau: I did not put them in.

"Senator Fulbright: But you will be faced by that situation, is what I mean.

"Mr. Morgenthau: I can only report to you—and the two American delegates that are sitting here at this committee table can either affirm or deny what happened—but the thought was—

"The Chairman: I have just checked with Senator Tobey, and neither one of us heard any politics at all at Bretton Woods.

"Mr. Morgenthau: The thought was that those countries could come to a world bank or a world fund and get their financial needs taken care of without having to sell their political souls. And that was the whole idea. I am sorry, Senator Fulbright, but I would not be honest if I did not stick to my guns on that, and that is my conception of Bretton Woods. These are to be financial institutions run by financial people, financial experts, and the needs in a financial way of a country are to be taken care of wholly independent of the political connection.

"Senator Fulbright: Then if this country has no foreign policy and blunders along as it did for the last 20 years, you would go ahead and finance, say, the Argentine, regardless of what you thought it would do, and the same as to any other country.

"Mr. Morgenthau: You put me in an embarrassing position, but I will have to answer.

"Senator Fulbright: I do not mean to embarrass you, but do want to know what the idea is.

"Mr. Morgenthau: I understand. But I will go through with it: If the Argentine was a member of the Bank and the Fund, and she needed certain financial help to meet her requirements, being a member her requirements are to be taken care of independent of her political ideology. I choked on it, but I went through with it.

"Senator Fulbright: It seems to me that is going pretty far, and I do not quite agree that that is a sound policy.

"Mr. Morgenthau: That is in the record, too.

"Senator Fulbright: It would seem to me that it means the fund will have no relationship to the State Department. But let us assume the State Department does develop some consistent policy in foreign relations; I cannot help but believe that our financial policy should be subservient to the political policy as established by the State Department. It does not seem proper that our various relationships with other countries should be conducted entirely separate from and without any regard to other relations.

"Mr. Morgenthau: I would rather not answer that on the record. . . .

"Senator Taft: Do you think when a board is set up, composed of the great nations and the small nations of the world, they are not going to be affected by politics about the making of a loan to a nation?

"Mr. Morgenthau: I am repeating myself on this, but the institutions will carry out their work as far as it is humanly possible to do it—and it depends on the people running it—on a strictly business basis.

"Senator Taft: We may be as noble as we are pleased to hope we will be, but what and Bank; thus, United States foreign economic policy was subject to review and determination by those also responsible for political policy.⁹

Another aspect of U. S. postwar foreign economic policy which shows that its early orientation was world-wide and without restriction as to foreign political or economic systems was the Administration's consideration in 1944-45 of a large-scale loan to Russia for reconstruction and development.¹⁰ That this loan was never negotiated was due in part to Russian recalcitrance with reference to other foreign economic policies of the United States, in part to the growing recognition of the importance of political considerations, in part to fortuitous circumstances in the postwar period, and in part to the reluctance of the Administration to precipitate in later years (1947 and 1948) a full-scale congressional debate on Soviet-American relations.

II. INHERENT POLITICAL FACTORS

Basic contradictions existed between the Administration's attitude toward international financial cooperation and the world in which the agencies had to justification is there for the theory that the English, the Russians, and other people will take that position? Aren't they going to use any weapon they have for their purposes in Europe?

"Mr. Morgenthau: Gentlemen, I hope you will believe I am very sincere. I think in these things like Bretton Woods we have to assume the nations of the world have learned something while going through this bloody war we are just emerging from in Europe, and that we have the right to assume as between nations there is going to be a new conception of dealings one with another. If there is not, the world is lost.

"Senator Taft: I certainly would be glad to be able to join you in that hope. But I think it hard to imagine having an international body of this sort free from politics resorted to by people sitting on the board.

"Senator Fulbright: I don't see why it should be. I think politics is not such a disreputable thing that it cannot be accepted in this or any other international organization, if by politics is meant some regard for the best interest of one's own country. . . .

Therefore, I don't think the administration should say we are not going to have any consideration for politics in various countries. It seems to me to be perfectly proper to say, 'Yes, we are, but we are going to try to be intelligent about it.' That does not mean we are going to try to control Europe's internal politics. That is quite different from saying that all the internal affairs of a country is of no interest to us, which seems to me also rather stupid."

(Bretton Woods Agreement Act, Hearings on H. R. 3514, U. S. Senate Comm. on Banking and Currency, 79th Congr., 1st sess., June 1945, pp. 14-16; italics added.)

⁹ The desirability of some such council was urged earlier by Secretary Morgenthau himself, who in July, 1944 wanted to place in a new committee, of which he would be chairman, all questions of international financial relations and aid to foreign countries so as to coordinate all financial policy under a single authority and maximize the good will obtainable from foreign aid.

operate. Far from being the "non-political" enterprise its originators intended it to be, the cooperation was, unavoidably, political. The organizations' members were governments whose delegates were government officials. These delegates were hardly able to examine a problem solely on its economic or financial merits and quite apart from the political consequences of the solution for the power and prestige of each member.¹¹ Nations are, by their very nature, political and cannot act governmentally without considering political implications (in the sense of national interests and of relative national position in the world) unless they deny the basis of their existence. Thus, for example, in intergovernmental organizations the mere question of membership becomes political. Again, the movement of international investment and the extension of foreign aid are fraught with political implications concerning the balance of power within and among regions.

It is only necessary to pose the question of what would be the characteristics of an a-political international economic organization to show the difficulty of divorcing its operations from political considerations. First, what would be its membership? Would the exclusion of any nation be discriminatory and thus lead to political tensions? Second, how would decisions be taken? By simple majority? How would coalitions of nations be prevented so as to avoid exercise of political influence? Should each member have one vote, or should voting power be weighted according to some criterion of power or responsibility? Third, how would the "experts" representing each nation be chosen? How would they be politically divorced from their government? If an expert were politically divorced, what responsibility or authority would he have? Could he count on support of his political parent? If not, would his decisions be of any avail? If so, would his decisions not take on a political character immediately? To what degree would any member government guarantee to abide by a-political decisions of a group of "disinterested" experts? Is any nation likely to surrender sovereignty to such an institution? Finally, do not the facts that any decision has to be politically ratified and that any member has the power to withdraw require that political power and position be taken into account by each and every international economic organization in some degree?

These questions were not publicly debated, but the Administration's policies in promoting the technique of international economic cooperation were questioned not only, as noted above, as to their inherent political character, but also with regard to the problems of sovereignty and of whether Russian participation would make the agencies unworkable. On the latter point, the standard reply of Administration officials was that international cooperation required the participation of Russia even if its being a member appeared contradictory to the purposes of the economic organizations established, as in the case of the International Monetary Fund.¹² With reference to the question of sovereignty, the Administration argued that joining an international organization was not a surrender of sovereignty but an exercise of it and that the ability to withdraw protected the ultimate freedom of action of any government.

¹¹ The fact that members had not decided questions on purely technical grounds was the basis of Australia's plea during the Sixth Annual Meeting of the Board of Governors of the International Monetary Fund, Washington, D. C., for a "non-political and impartial approach" to problems before the Fund. By this time United States officials and others recognized, and so asserted, that political positions and viewpoints could not be disregarded. (Fund Session No. 3, September 11, 1951.)

The question of sovereignty is not so easily answered. Even if voting is perfectly "democratic" (whatever that may mean as to the weighting of voting among nations represented¹³), those being out-voted lose some freedom of action; they must now conform to something they do not desire, or find escape from it under the agreement, or withdraw and face some degree of moral, political or economic suasion. To assume that a nation with a very large stake in the results of an agreed-upon international policy will accept the decision of the majority, if it is in the minority, when most of the responsibility for carrying out the decision successfully will rest on its own shoulders is, again, naive in view of the historical relations of nations.¹⁴

The problem of sovereignty is pointed up in the fact that nations have as yet shown no propensity to forego popular domestic policies or programs merely to conform to what other nations might desire—and it should not have been assumed that the war had made any change in this respect, especially in light of the conflicts even on the technical level during negotiations of postwar agreements. Thus, national programs of land reform, of redistribution of income, of full employment, and of social services, for example, were instituted in spite of conflicts which arose with the aims of some international economic organizations, and to state in the International Monetary Fund Charter that certain actions of members would not be objected to merely because of underlying "domestic political and social" policies and programs begged the question and showed a willingness to become blind to reality in order to obtain agreement on high-sounding principles. The degree of incompatibility of domestic policies with principles which can be agreed upon internationally is shown by the number of exceptions and escape clauses attached to the implementation of the principles by the nations party to the Bretton Woods Agreements and the ITO Charter.

¹³ The principle of "one nation, one vote" is itself, of course, a method of "weighting." It was employed under UNRRA and was a reason for many of its difficulties. This particular means of practicing "democracy" among nations is necessary and desirable where broad policies are to be decided by an international body but have to be ratified by national legislatures; otherwise, a minority of governments may cause friction by attempting to impose policies on a larger number of nations. However, when the mere allocation of financial assistance is involved, and when the funds are contributed by a few member nations, the practice of weighted voting has much to commend it as a means of preventing misuse of the funds by the recipients. If voting is weighted, giving some nations more authority than others, these then have a pragmatic responsibility not to impose their will on others when trivial or technical questions arise, yet it is equally foolish for them to refrain from using their voting authority to support national viewpoints on policy questions.

Any program of international financial cooperation which does not recognize and make provision for the dominance of larger and more powerful nations in the economic and political relations of the world, or for the existence of "national interests," or for the desire to retain freedom of action over domestic policies and programs, is incompatible with the conditions of international economic and political relations. The following discussion of postwar experience emphasizes that attempts to "de-politicize" inter-governmental economic organizations were doomed to failure and that, given the current nationalist mentality, international organizations set up without adequate recognition of the preoccupation with "national interests" will most likely be circumscribed or circumvented by crippling exceptions and escape clauses, leaving the principles without adequate means of implementation. On the other hand, recognition of the power-relations of nations and of their preoccupation with domestic policies will mean that a much narrower field of international cooperation is possible; it would probably, however, be a more active field. Such a limited agreement would not preclude agreement on the general principles which all nations would strive to implement "in due time and when conditions permitted," and provision could be made for continuous consultation on the possibility of putting the principles into effect. International economic cooperation is not impossible, but the framers of international organizations should recognize the circumstances (both political and economic) within which they will operate. As is shown below, almost total absence of this recognition was what brought disappointment to the United States in the operations of UNRRA and a reversal of its "de-politicization" policy, which in turn disappointed some other nation-members of the Fund and Bank, and led to a new form of international financial cooperation under later aid programs.

III. A BI-POLAR WORLD AND TRUNCATED INTERNATIONALISM

The Administration adopted the position that it would be necessary for the success of international cooperation to have full participation by Russia in each organization. In the field of economic cooperation, where Russia was bent on state-controlled trading, there were significant reasons why its participation would not have been advantageous to the United States.¹⁵ But there was reason to encourage its participation in relief and reconstruction assistance so long as political relations continued on a friendly basis,¹⁶ both to prevent the charge of imperialism against any nation and to spread the financial burden. The United States was concerned that relief aid should not be used to place any particular regime in power or to bolster the influence of a foreign power in the recipient's economy. This "non-political" use of aid was the espoused aim of the United States in cooperating internationally in UNRRA. But there were several political reasons why Congress, at least, was to become dissatisfied with UNRRA and why the Administration abandoned it before its work was completed.

Major disappointments to Congress were the lack of gratitude on the part of recipients and the large volume of aid sent to nations sympathetic to communism. In justification of these results, it must be understood that the Articles of Agreement of UNRRA provided that it should operate through the existing governments, which were largely unwilling and unable to distribute the aid on other than a "political" basis. And the feeling of some U. S. officials that the aid was not distributed in such a way as to maximize goodwill for America (see below) did not take into account the fact that wartime propaganda from the Allies promised that liberation would be followed immediately by relief and that strong resistance by the peoples of the enemy-occupied countries would hasten that day.¹⁷ Thus, when relief supplies came, governments felt little obligation to play up the fact that the goods were supplied from an international or United States source, since they were considered a "reward" for the country's participation in driving out the enemy. Also, the charge made by some members of Congress that UNRRA had aided Eastern European countries more than it should have in comparison to other countries was invalid, although that area received by far the largest allocation of aid. The allocation had actually been made in the light of United States insistence that countries able to pay with international reserves do so, thus leaving Eastern Europe as the primary area (besides China) to receive aid.

A further source of discomfort to Congress consisted of reports that Russia, through its membership in the UNRRA administration,¹⁸ was hampering the operations of the organization, especially in countries bordering it, and was using the supplies sent to areas under its shadow to strengthen the hands of did work together effectively until their willingness to cooperate diminished and then disappeared with the growing ideological and political conflict. (G. Woodbridge, and others, UNRRA: The History of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration (N. Y., 1950), Vol. 2 pp. 535-52.)

¹⁷ The attitude on the part of liberated countries that aid was "due" them was stressed by the Russian member of the UNRRA Council during 1946 when he stated: "Peoples of occupied countries had been promised assistance. These promises had inspired them to greater resistance, which in turn had led to greater destruction of their resources. People who had borne the burden of invasion and had suffered so much destruction of their property had earned the right to assistance." (UNRRA Journal, Fourth Session of the Council, Atlantic City, N. J., March 19, 1946, Vol. 4, No. 4, p. 6.)

¹⁸ The fact that Russia contributed only to the administrative budget of UNRRA and not to its operating budget made its actions all the less palatable to Congress, since Russian representatives were partially controlling the use of funds contributed largely by the United States.

those favoring the spread of communism.¹⁹ There appeared to be evidence that the distribution of supplies was not "non-political," within recipient nations, as was intended by the United States;²⁰ and the question of repatriation of displaced persons was injected into deliberations and operations.²¹ Even the problem of personnel recr

Klemme also states (p. 144) that Poland, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, took from returning DP's any food distributed to them by UNRRA on the thereby forcing a change in UNRRA policy.

Political considerations were involved also in discussions of the extensi ex-enemy countries (e.g., Italy) and to those not occupied during the war See on the Italian question, Journal, Second Session of the Council, Septen pp. 104-25. They arose also over a resolution that UNRRA should requisit other resources in occupied countries for use in relief—particularly in Austri jointly occupied. Communist delegates argued that this question was outside came political.²² Despite the political overtones, the U. S. argued until late 1946 that UNRRA be allowed to continue to prove that international organizations could function successfully.

Apart from the political aspects injected by other nations, circumstances into UNRRA's operations, the United States had some political strings of its own. Many members of Congress apparently intended that UNRRA should instill a sense of fear in the countries around the Soviet border and assist in the fight against communism. This interpretation is supported by the emphasis placed on the "goodwill" factor before Congress in the Act of 1943 and in the congressional desire to impose conditions which would make it difficult for them to turn to communism. The Administration was apparently operating on the basis that an absence of restrictive conditions on the aid would be a vote for the status quo and that, without attached conditions, Russia would in turn insist on imposition of UNRRA. The U. S. member argued first that he thought it should be divorced from the political considerations, but later remarked that it was a course of cowardice to retire because there might be political aspects to the problem; and both UNRRA and the whole cause of international relief would suffer as a result." (Journal, Fourth Session of the Council, March 27, pp. 1-4 and March 29, pp. 1-3.)

At the Fifth Council Session, August, 1946, at Geneva, the Soviet representative, Feonov, pointed out that friendly criticism of UNRRA had not attracted attention; thus, contrary to the USSR's counsel, the Korean program had made little progress with the repatriation of displaced persons. He also mentioned the presence of occupational troops in Austria and some action by the Austrian authorities—questions clearly within the scope of other international relief organizations of which the USSR had warned, would endanger UNRRA's reputation as an international relief organization." (Woodbridge, Vol. 1, p. 47.)

²² The hiring of personnel was not intended to be at the suggestion of the government because of the pressure of officials in all governments to gain employment. The lack of information on applicants (especially from Russia), and the fact that many applicants were already in government service, UNRRA's selection of personnel was under considerable political pressure. In the case of Russia, its suggested personnel were without preliminary interviews." Russia also opposed strongly the employment of enemy nationals, neutrals, or nationals of non-member governments. The Council finally approved their employment in principle, but on the condition that they be employed. In evaluating the effect of political and social factors on UNRRA's operations, its historian concluded that "... it is not easy for an organization to be efficient and simultaneously to implement policies politically and in accordance with the customs of the society in which it functions" (Woodbridge, Vol. 1, p. 542).

favor of its political and economic policies.²⁴ The Administration supported its position with the argument that once aid was stopped, there would be no assurance that the conditions previously imposed would be accepted by the foreign country, and that in fact a reaction against such reaction would have militated against the success of the Administration's long-term plans for postwar reconstruction; it was reluctant to set a precedent for attaching conditions to any subsequent economic assistance and long and hard in later programs of economic aid against any extra-activist conditions on the receipt of aid and any overt or explicit injective political pressure.

But after so strongly supporting UNRRA in mid-1946 as a successful organization in administering relief assistance, the State Department, in a position at the end of 1946 on proposals for continued international relief through the United Nations after the end of UNRRA,²⁵ flatly rejected the use of the United Nations organization for relief: "... the United States does not believe that post-UNRRA relief should be conducted by an UNRRA type organization."²⁶ Acting Secretary of State Acheson then denied the charge that the United States is abandoning international cooperation in refusing to participate in relief on an international basis and the charge that "the United States intends to use food as a political weapon."²⁷ He stated that these charges were disproved by the facts that relatively few nations needed relief and that relief could best be supplied by direct request to the U. S. government, which would clear the requests through the United Nations:

In this manner, nations receiving free relief must prove their need for it, and be held to a much closer and fairer accountability of the use of food and other relief. Those in power will be compelled to distribute relief food on the basis of need, not be allowed to feed their political supporters and starve their political opponents.

²⁴ This question of imposition of conditions on recipients of aid from an international agency shows clearly that political aspects were not absent and should, at the time, have placed grave doubts on the feasibility of Russian-American cooperation as long as so ardently desired adherents to its system; but who will argue that the experiment has not been made?

That the successful operation of any international organization in which each country has an equal voice and which includes both Russia and the United States (so long as they continue to support their present ideologies) precludes the attaching of conditions to assistance appeared never to strike Congress; nor was the point ever present to the Administration in just this way. For additional comment on the feasibility of Russian-American cooperation in such a relief organization, see Philip C. Jessup, "Sample of World Organization," Foreign Affairs, Vol. 22, pp. 372-73 (April, 1944); J. Perry, "Why UNRRA Has Failed," Harper's Magazine, Vol. 192, pp. 8-10 (August, 1946).

The people of the United States and the Congress of the United States were not of their minds that the relief problems of the near future are not of the kind that warrant grants of enormous sums of money from the United States which would leave little or no effective control by the grantor of the funds.

The italicized phrases indicate that the end of UNRRA was not a failure of politics but a cessation of its need, and that relief was politicized," notwithstanding Mr. Lehman's previous assurance that the failure of UNRRA would betoken failure of other world-wide relief efforts. The word "failure" should not be construed as meaning that UNRRA failed in alleviating suffering, preventing the spread of disease, or saving large numbers of people: it was successful in its relief work within the limits of its resources. Nor did it fail as an experiment in international relief: as long as its member governments were willing to cooperate, it worked as well together as could be expected, given different methods, and procedures in handling similar problems. The word "failed" was in meeting the unrealistic expectations of United States members of Congress that it would operate independently of the United States and yet bring international goodwill to the United States. The idea that the pooling of national resources to assume a common burden was unsound.²⁸

Thus, the primary factor in the United States policy of relief was the support from an international agency it had fostered as "a political use of internationally supplied goods coupled with the consideration of some of the problems it faced (such as DP's) in the political conditions."²⁹ In the post-UNRRA aid program it sought to conceal the fact that the aid would not be given to countries that ²⁹ Klemme asserts that UNRRA was a failure if success is measured by the funds were spent "in the most efficient manner for the benefit of the deserving people." He charged that "International politics got in the way of personnel and in the acquisition and distribution of supplies" and gave an interesting discussion of how and to what extent UNRRA failed, pp. 535-52.

³⁰ In presenting the post-UNRRA aid program to Congress for 1948, the Administration testified that the aid was necessary to keep the political situation in the recipient countries from turning into one that the United States did not want. In the debate on post-UNRRA aid, many members expressed concern over the misuse of UNRRA funds by Russia and the extension of its aid to countries whose practices to be guarded against in the new program. (Congressional Record, 73rd Cong., 2d Sess., pp. 3822 ff., 3861 ff., and 4167 ff., and May 21, 1947, pp. 4167 ff.) The Administration asked for "plain talk" from the Administration as to the political situation in the program, which they conceived to be a result of not being able to cooperate with Russia. The Administration admitted (after the decision in early 1947 that Turkey had pointed up the rift with Russia) that a prime difficulty was the lack of cooperation with Russia and that its postwar policy had been predicated on four-power cooperation in relief and reconstruction. See testimony of the Secretary of State and Tyler Wood on June 25, 1947, during the House Subcommittee Hearings on the Supplemental Appropriation Bill for 1948, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 1-2.

U.S. INTERNATIONAL FINANCIAL COOPERATION, 1945-1950

Communism, and aid authorized to Poland and Hungary was not except because each was soon taken over or dominated by the Communists.

The changed attitude of the Administration and Congress toward international financial cooperation was evidenced again by the failure to provide Greek-Turkish aid be provided through the UN, though the purpose of the program were much wider than the extension of relief or the improvement of bilateral relations. The Administration justified the bilateral approach in the face of grave doubts in Congress, on the grounds that it could not present the requests to the UN because (1) the governments addressed the United States, (2) Congress had not taken a position on American participation in any UN program of such assistance, (3) the UN had no money, Congress would have to appropriate some anyway, (4) the UN would have had to call a special session and would not have gotten a program in time, and (5) it would be better to support the UN by quick, direct aid rather than to foist off on it a job it could not handle effectively. Congress approached so decidedly that only a few voices were raised to question the retreat from international (world-wide) cooperation to a policy of reconstruction through bilateral arrangements as under the European Recovery Program (1948) and the Mutual Defense Assistance Program (1949).

These developments showed that the "non-political" character of international financial cooperation, as earlier conceived by the United States, was incompatible with the existence of two (or more) parties having diametrically opposed ideas as to the proper form of world political and economic organization. Recognition of this opposition and the apparent dislike of having to provide information to other countries about internal affairs were factors in Russia's withdrawal from further international financial cooperation. Russia's policy of avoiding membership in international economic institutions was evidenced first in 1945 by its non-ratification of the Bretton Woods Agreements, which its representatives had signed. This abstinence presaged a growth of non-cooperation, since it was accompanied by Russia's expression of unwillingness to negotiate promptly a settlement of wartime lend-lease. This attitude was reflected most clearly in its decision not to accept a bid to join the European Recovery Program and even to keep its satellites from joining. In offering to include Russia in the Marshall Plan, the United States ostensibly supported international (world-wide) financial cooperation, but after Russia had shown that it was not only unwilling to cooperate more likely directly to oppose the reconstruction of the world under the leadership of the United States, as witnessed by its indirect support of guerrillas and its pressure on the borders of Turkey during 1947.

This pressure and opposition of Russia was a primary (if sole) reason for the failure of the system of world-wide economic cooperation envisaged by the United States to remain a-political; and after 1947. But in 1944-45 there were no strong indications that four-power collaboration was inappropriate. The major powers had considered that, although Russia would not join a lateral, nondiscriminatory trading system, it would seek to maintain peaceful political and economic relations by means of trade. In addition, the major part of the burden of postwar reconstruction was expected to be borne by the "Big Four" (China was expected to contribute directly to the financing of any economic program). Four-power collaboration was a key to the successful restoration and to the reopening of trade channels to the mutual benefit of all because of the ability of at least the Big Three (Russia, United States, and United Kingdom) to provide needed goods; their cooperation would be effective in removing the disease and unrest left in the wake of war. Political and economic stability would have been fostered if reconstruction had been forthcoming. The world did not expect and was not prepared for overt hostility to, and outright sabotage of, its long-range economic cooperation.

Given this hostility, certainly the hopes of the United States for world-wide economic cooperation in the reconstruction program were bound to be dashed, and the type of internationalism which had been effective was changed. This change was reflected both in the attitude of the United States after 1946 and in the attitude of the United States toward international financial organizations.

Some Administration officials realized that the United States had to turn toward the International Bank and the International Monetary Fund as crucial in making them "international" (in the sense of including a few members).²² Other officials, however, had shown by their attitude toward the institutions largely "American" in character indirectly to the political foreign policies of the United States. As revealed in the early negotiations on the location of the two institutions, the extent of supervision of the Fund over the use of its resources. At the Bretton Woods Conference, Lord Keynes had pressed the United States to maintain the dominance of that city in financial affairs.

²² "It is important that governments, too, recognize that these are international institutions. No country, however great or strong, in its economic position in the world, can take the attitude that these are creatures of its own. Nothing could destroy the usefulness of the Fund and the Bretton Woods Institutions more than a feeling in other countries that they are subservient to the interests of the United States."

"And nothing would more enhance the world prestige and the prestige of the United States Government than a demonstration of its appreciation of the character of international institutions." (J. W. Pehle, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, "The Bretton Woods Institutions," Yale Law Journal, 1946).

world; when this move failed because of American objections, he urged that they be located at the situs of other international organizations,³³ but the American delegates finally gained acceptance of their proposal to locate them in the United States. Many persons were concerned that they might be located in Washington and thus tend to be politically-oriented institutions. Arthur Krock reported, however, that in Washington, "There is a feeling against locating an international institution in the capital city of any nation, and this will probably prevail."³⁴ Those having this feeling had reckoned, evidently, without taking into account the views of Secretary of the Treasury Vinson. After stating that Keynes had tended to take for granted that the Fund and Bank would be located in New York with the UNO, R. F. Harrod writes that Keynes has the following account in his notes on the meeting at Savannah:

"... in New York they would be in the daily contacts which can be provided by a great centre of international finance; they would be sufficiently removed from the politics of Congress and the nationalistic whispering gallery of the Embassies and Legations of Washington; and they would probably be sufficiently near to the seat of UNO to be able to co-operate closely on the economic and statistical side of their work with the Economic and Social Council.

"... Mr. Vinson told me that the American Delegation had decided that both institutions should be placed in Washington and that this was a final decision the merits of which they were not prepared to discuss. The U. S. Administration, he said, was entitled to decide for themselves what location within the U. S. was to be preferred."³⁵

Because of this and other more or less unilateral decisions by the American delegation, Keynes had a foreboding that the institutions might assume a political character under which every action "shall not be for its own sake or on its own merits but because of something else."³⁶

Keynes' fear was not wholly justified by the actual operations of either the Fund or Bank; but neither has functioned without political implications or has avoided some "dictation" by American officials.³⁷ The possibility of the latter arose, also at an early stage, concerning the question of whether the Fund's role should be active or passive: that is, whether it should be a "school-mistress" and assert a positive control over the use of its resources or whether the drawing rights would be "automatic" at the volition of the member (once declared eligible within the Articles of Agreement). United States officials had agreed in principle (but apparently only under pressure from other countries) to the latter role during most of the negotiations prior to and during Bretton ³⁵ The Life of John Maynard Keynes (New York, 1951), pp. 629-30. Harrod goes on to report that this decision was a personal one of Mr. Vinson, having the support of the President but not of the U. S. delegation. Nevertheless, what the other members saw was a unilateral decision of the United States which had political coloring.

Woods; but at the Savannah Conference in late 1946 the American delegation reverted to its initial stand, arguing that two full-time directors would be required to represent each major country or group of countries because of the importance of operational questions.³⁸ Harrod reports, again, that the American view carried because the United States was in a dominant bargaining position and was not beyond using that position for its own purposes.³⁹ Keynes considered that the Savannah meeting showed that national power had been "used, for irrelevant motives, to frustrate a good purpose, and he had been denied by the possibility of the defeat of the British Loan in Congress the weapons to which a combatant was entitled."⁴⁰ There is no evidence that the United States used the resources of the Bank or the Fund for political purposes in the sense of imperialism or that its national power was used for unimportant purposes.⁴¹ But, as intended by Congress, the guidance of the U. S. executive director on the Fund and Bank by the National Advisory Council (a Cabinet-level body) lends a political air to American participation.⁴²

³⁸ Raymond F. Mikesell, who was a technical adviser to the U. S. delegation at Bretton Woods and attended the Savannah meeting, has written that, in the decisions on the role of the executive directors and on the location of the Fund in Washington, the United States injected political considerations into the Fund's operation but that such a result was inevitable when policy questions were involved, since only government representatives could make the decisions. See his "The International Monetary Fund, 1944-1949," International Conciliation, No. 455, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, November 1949, pp. 843-47. For similar comment on the decisions at the Savannah Conference, see E. A. G. Robinson, "John Maynard Keynes," Economic Journal, March, 1947, p. 65.

As mentioned earlier, one way to reduce political influence in an organization of "experts" would be to disassociate them from governments. In selecting official representatives to the Fund and Bank, the United States apparently avoided appointing men from private financial circles (though many applied for the positions) and placed government officials, who were familiar with the political considerations involved, in the more responsible positions. See the attack on this policy in the New York Times, May 22, 1946, by its associate financial editor, E. H. Collins.

⁴² The National Advisory Council itself has expressed the idea that the Fund more or less automatically follows the policies of the United States or, at least, that it could force the Fund to do so. When reporting on the U. S. official attitude toward the use of the Fund's resources, NAC wrote: "The National Advisory Council [in formulating] United States policy with respect to the Fund . . . has tried to avoid the extreme, on the one hand, of acquiescing in the virtually automatic use of the Fund's resources to meet any type of current deficit, while also, on the other hand, avoiding the extreme of insisting upon such rigid standards as would practically have suspended the Fund's currency operations until

One evidence of possible political influence by the United States in the International Bank is the practice, due largely to the fact that most of the loan funds came from the United States government's contribution or the American capital market, of the U. S. executive director's being asked for the official American view on any loan application received by the Bank even before it is submitted to the executive directors as a group for consideration.

Despite the probability that the American position is formed as much on political as on economic grounds, a strong case can be made that the International Bank has, by and large, lived up to the intentions of its founders that it be a means of avoiding the political pressures which formerly surrounded international (public and private) lending. It extended loans amounting to more than $1 billion during 1947-1950 without any borrower charging imperialism or interference in its domestic political affairs. Most of its loans were for specific projects in countries which needed construction aid or were programming economic development. But it cannot be argued that the Bank has completely avoided political pitfalls and remained "exclusively technical," as some members have argued that it should be.⁴³

Although the Bank is explicitly prevented by its Articles of Agreement from extending (or not extending) loans for political reasons,⁴⁴ considerations of political conditions and positions of members were taken into account. Bank officials recognized early that in the disturbed conditions in the postwar period, political uncertainty and instability were prime considerations in the determination of whether a member was a good economic risk for a long-term investment.⁴⁵ Political considerations were cited by the Bank as being most significant in determining its policy on loans to Europe during the time of the European Recovery Program.

Considerations of political instability could, of course, be taken into account

"The Bank and its officers shall not interfere in the political affairs of any member; nor shall they be influenced in their decisions by the political character of the member or members concerned. Only economic considerations shall be relevant to their decisions, and these considerations shall be weighed impartially in order to achieve the purposes stated in Article I."

⁴⁵ "It is unfortunate but nonetheless true that the existing political difficulties and uncertainties in Europe present special problems which have thus far prevented the Bank from making loans in those countries. The Bank is fully cognizant of the injunction in its Articles of Agreement that its decisions shall be based only on economic considerations. Political tensions and uncertainties in or among its member countries, however, have a direct effect on economic and financial conditions in those countries and upon their credit position." (IBRD, Third Annual Report, 1947-1948, p. 14.) See also Second Annual Report 1946-1947, pp. 16, 17, and statement of John J. in determining the economic soundness of a loan without power politics or political alliances greatly influencing the decisions. In fact, however, the Bank apparently has been guided in some of its decisions by the political ideologies of applicants. In 1947, Czechoslovakia applied for a loan of $350 million and Poland for $600 million. Negotiations by the Bank with these two nations resulted in a scaling down of the amounts, but early in 1948 (after these countries, at the insistence of Russia, failed to join in the Marshall Plan) negotiations were suspended, no reason being made public by the Bank.⁴⁶ During the Third Annual Meeting of the Board of Governors (October, 1948), there were some expressions of "fear that the Bank was, to some extent, influenced by political considerations in making loans," and Czechoslovakia has repeatedly charged "discrimination" at successive meetings. Poland withdrew from both the Bank and the Fund on the ostensible grounds that the Fund, at least, had become "a submissive instrument of the Government of the United States, whose economic and political expansion is in direct contradiction to the purpose to be served by the Fund."⁴⁷ (The Fund did not, of course, admit these allegations, saying that they were refuted by its history and actions.)

The Bank did, however, hold on for some time to the "a-political" requisites for its lending and attempted to negotiate during late 1947 and early 1948 some special loans for financing exports of timber from Eastern European countries (Austria, Czechoslovakia, Finland, Poland, and Yugoslavia) to Western Europe in the hope of expanding the volume of East-West trade. Such loans were worked out in 1948 with Finland and Yugoslavia, but Poland and Austria stated that they would not need the financing and withdrew, while Czechoslovakia withdrew only after it found it impossible to work out payments agreements with importing countries.⁴⁸ In actuality, therefore, no loans were extended to help increase a rapidly falling volume of vital East-West trade in Europe; but whether any volume of loans would have stemmed the decline is questionable given the contract terms demanded by Eastern European countries and Russia's apparent aim of turning the trade of its satellites toward itself.

The obverse side of the above policy is illustrated by the extension of aid to Yugoslavia in increasing amounts after it showed a tendency to become independent of Russian influence, with the International Bank making a loan of $9 million in 1949. Yugoslavia was still, like Poland and Czechoslovakia, communistic, but its defection was politically and strategically important and was the basis for financial support from the West. Some additional political influence on Bank lending arising partly from the rift of the West with Russia can be seen in the loans to economically under-developed countries outside the Soviet orbit. These loans were explicitly stated to be in line with the Point IV Program—none were given to support the Molotov Plan for Eastern Europe—and no small percentage were justified on the ground that they would increase the supply of raw materials needed for mobilization programs of the West.⁴⁹

A final example of the injection of considerations of political alliance into Bank policy is that of the repeated requests by Czechoslovakia that the de facto rule of the Communist regime in China be recognized by admission of that government to the Bank and Fund and by the ejection of the Nationalist Chinese representative. In 1951, on a motion by the governor from the United States, seconded by the governor from the United Kingdom, the resolution submitted by Czechoslovakia was not acted upon.⁵⁰

These observations on the impact of political considerations and alliances on the Bank's lending operations should not be construed as an indictment of Bank policy. They do, however, refute the view that the Bank is a purely technical body, divorced from international political pressures. The Bank should not have been expected to stay aloof from politics; that it has been able to reduce the influence so much among Western members is a result of its dealing with specific projects needing capital rather than with governmental programs or "credit worthiness" of members.

The record of the International Monetary Fund on "political lending" is similar to that of the Bank, but it has been subjected to more severe attack by members because its rejection of applicants involved some ranking of nations as to "credit-worthiness." Like the Bank, the Fund did not allow drawings from its resources by Poland or Austria,⁵¹ and it extended credit to Yugoslavia, in 1949, only after its break with the Comintern. An exception to the pattern of lending only to countries sympathetic to the cause of the West was a $6 million drawing by Czechoslovakia in the fiscal year 1948-1949 even after it had refused to participate in the European Recovery Program and had turned its economic and political orientation toward Russia. This has been the only credit to Soviet-oriented nations, however, and, as stated above, Poland withdrew in protest over the Fund's policy on lending and Czechoslovakia has repeatedly charged the Fund with discriminating against its requests. It would be difficult to prove such discrimination, however, for public records do not report all requests or rejections or the reasons therefor. Further, Fund policy on use of its resources underwent a sharp change in 1948, and while most Western European nations received no credits from the Fund, Czechoslovakia did. The ostensible reason for the restrictions on Fund operations with Europe from 1948 through 1950—no loans at all were made in 1950—was the large volume of aid received under the European Recovery Program, but underlying the action was the existence of political and economic instability in Europe.

⁴⁹ The Bank has allowed some of its funds to be tied directly to the development program of the British Commonwealth through Britain's release in 1953 of some of its "18% subscription" for use in lending only to Commonwealth borrowers. The Bank's Articles of Agreement allow a member to determine whether or not the 18% of its initial subscription, made in currency of the member, shall be loaned, but they do not provide for limitation on the countries to which the funds shall be loaned. The Bank may pick the projects and the receivers, within the limited number of Commonwealth countries, but this sort of identification of lender and borrower was a characteristic of international lending which the Bank was to eliminate.

During 1948, political instability in Europe and the "need" of governments to institute large-scale investment and social service programs—despite their tendency to accelerate an already rising inflation—made it apparent that any use of the Fund's resources by European members would tend to remove the pressure to make the reforms which were necessary to reduce the deficit in international balances of payments.⁵² The decision was based in large measure on political considerations and their impact on the economic soundness of the use of additional resources. Another political aspect was evidenced in the pressure the United States apparently put on other members to restrict Fund operations through the exercise of its great bargaining power arising both within the Fund and through the projected ERP aid.⁵³ The Fund, therefore, like the Bank, found that it had to take political conditions and alliances into account. The decision was apparently (regardless of its correctness) an example of what Keynes had predicted in the use of political power to gain action on questions which, in many minds, should have been dealt with on purely economic grounds.

The explicit recognition in 1948 of the existence of a bi-polar world and the resulting truncated internationalism discussed above were followed in U.S. policy by a desire for greater control over financial assistance and for a closer identification of aid programs with political objectives. The policy of "containment of Communism" was supported by a regional association of European countries based on bilateral agreements with the United States, stressing the unity of economic and political objectives among the signatories.

IV. THE REGIONAL APPROACH TO COOPERATION

Under all economic assistance programs until 1948, the needs of and assistance given to each country were determined with little consideration of programs for other countries. The volume of aid given to each country under UNRRA and post-UNRRA was inadequate to meet even its relief "needs"; thus, it would have made little sense to attempt to integrate the supply of relief items among all countries receiving assistance. Also, loans by the International Bank and drawings of members from the Fund were considered in the light of the needs of individual members and not with a view to assisting two or more countries as a group. Italian Foreign Minister Carlo Sforza contended that this country-by-country approach was a prime factor in the slow recovery of Europe prior to 1948:

⁵² Fund officials justified their action in restricting use of its resources by potential borrowers by emphasizing that "the purpose of the use of the Fund's resources is to give them time to make necessary readjustments and not to avoid the necessity of such readjustments." (Annual Report, April 30, 1948, p. 47.)

The task of making peace was viewed as a series of separate problems, to be dealt with through a process of endless bargaining which resulted almost always in a success for Russian tactics and an extension of Soviet influence. European problems were never viewed as an organic whole, and economic reconstruction was looked upon as a problem of procuring emergency aid which would set in motion again a mechanism which had supposedly only jammed. In other words, each country tried to carry on from day to day by means of American aid, without plans and, as a result, often with a waste of relief funds. Naturally there was no European recovery.⁵⁴

This criticism places an excessive burden on the one factor of the form of cooperation and overlooks many of the more fundamental internal obstacles to recovery, which Sforza, if directly questioned, would probably not deny. But there was a growing view among official circles in both Europe and the United States to the effect that Europe's political and economic problems needed to be faced as a unit, thus preparing the way for the regional approach when a large-scale effort at European recovery was made with U. S. assistance.⁵⁵

Although the United States did attempt to look at the problem of Europe as a whole at the beginning of the European Recovery Program, it found that the task was too difficult in the time available, and the volume of aid was de-terminated on the basis of a summation of individual countries' estimates of their needs for foreign assistance and then scaled to fit what the Administration thought it could get through Congress. On the question of reduction of monetary barriers to intra-European trade and payments, however, the United States met with some success in urging a regional approach.⁵⁶ In 1947 the European countries agreed to set up an intra-European clearing scheme and did so with the blessing of the United States; subsequent years saw the revision of the initial scheme and the institution in 1950 of a European Payments Union. The point to be emphasized here is that the United States had adopted a different approach to international cooperation from that which it had originally espoused. Previous efforts at internationalism were along the functional line—each organization dealing with a specific problem facing the world as a whole, supposedly without the influence of national or regional considerations of power. Under the ERP, the United States turned to regionalism in an effort to meet pressing political problems and to concentrate on a variety of intractable economic problems within a more closely defined geographic area. The concentration on Europe as a region was because of a supposed interdependence of European economies and a desire to reduce duplication of reconstruction projects among the recipient nations. The concentration on the region of Europe rather than another area or areas was due to Russian opposition to European recovery, the belief that Europe was of primary importance in the fight against communism, and the necessity to husband scarce United States resources.⁵⁷ The adoption of the regional approach was not, therefore, due to any inherent advantage of that type of cooperation over the "world-wide" organization in performing the functions given to each; rather, the new approach was adopted because political conditions made it desirable to consolidate Western power against Russian opposition at the most dangerous point. The consolidation of effort was facilitated by placing all functions under one agency rather than by trying to coordinate the operations of all world-wide agencies so as to concentrate assistance in one area—especially in view of the fact that political differences existed as to the importance of one area compared with another.

⁵⁵ It must be admitted, however, that the association of European nations into a continuing organization to oversee the use of economic assistance was an idea originating not in Europe but in the United States—and the Organization for European Economic Cooperation was established mainly at the insistence of the United States. Sforza asserts (above, n. 54) that the United States waited too long to urge economic association on Europe; that immediately after the war there was widespread feeling among European countries that some new type of economic cooperation was necessary and feasible. It may be doubted, however, whether the "feelings" of various enlightened individuals could have been translated effectively into concrete association, especially in view of the strong desires of each country to regain its prosperity as quickly as possible without outside interference and without having to cooperate in helping others to reconstruct. Evidence of the soundness of this doubt exists also in the variety of means by which each country pursued its goals, in the reluctant fashion in which the ERP-countries grasped the idea of economic integration, in the slow process of their "study" of a customs union (see the voluminous work of the European Customs Union Study Group on the single, and technical, problem of tariff nomenclature and classification), and in the faltering steps toward a Benelux union and in unsuccessful efforts to form a union between France and Italy. See the report of progress in Survey of United States International Finance, 1949 (cited in n. 14), pp. 144-46.

The programs of foreign aid made political considerations increasingly significant in international financial cooperation, since the process of aiding one region more than another left some areas relatively less well cared for. For example, aid was not available to consolidate inter-American relations through assistance in economic development or to assist certain Asiatic countries in attempts to establish free and independent governments. Although the United States had long supported a regional approach to the problems of Latin (and North) America, it did not extend any significant amount of financial aid to Latin America in the postwar period. The necessity of meeting what it considered to be first problems first and of conserving its resources at a time of world-wide inflation required the United States to direct its extraordinary assistance, in the main, to the area which was most crucial in the maintenance of political stability and which could contribute most to the attainment of the goal of liberal trading systems. Prior to 1950-51, therefore, there was little interest on Capitol Hill in extending to Latin America aid other than technical assistance in small amounts through the Interdepartmental Committee on Scientific and Cultural Cooperation and the Institute of Inter-American Affairs. It is probable that the dollar balances which the Latin American countries held at the end of the war were the overt reason why there was little congressional or private interest in assistance to these republics. However, Latin America had a legitimate complaint that it was unable to use its dollar balances effectively during the immediate postwar period because of U. S. export controls, inflation, and shortages. Latin American countries considered that since they had cooperated with the United States during the war (at the cost of rising prices and depletion of some material resources), they had a claim to extraordinary assistance. Individually and as a group they made such requests, but U. S. officials argued that the International Bank and Export-Import Bank should be the sources tapped for capital needs of the American Republics. However, the International Bank did not consider the projects presented to it by the developing countries well enough prepared or thought out; therefore, it extended only a few million dollars of loans to Latin America prior to 1949.⁵⁸

⁵⁷ Under-Secretary Acheson stated on May 8, 1947, that the United States would have to concentrate its "emergency assistance in areas where it will be most effective in building world political and economic stability, in promoting human freedom and democratic institutions, in fostering liberal trading policies, and in strengthening the authority of the United States." (Department of State Bulletin, May 18, 1947, pp. 993-94.)

In an attempt to placate the South American countries, who "demanded" an Inter-American Development Bank with $5 billion capital at the Bogota Conference of the American Republics in early 1948,⁵⁹ the United States announced dramatically⁶⁰ that it was proposing to increase the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank by $500 million. This announcement, however, was received in a stony silence—"one of the coldest and most unanimous rebuffs in the history of Pan-Americanism," according to a United States correspondent on the scene.⁶¹ Former Under-Secretary of State Sumner Welles stated that "the feeling against this country at the Bogota Conference was more bitter than at any inter-American meeting since the Havana Conference in 1928."⁶² As it turned out, not even this $500 million from the EIB was made available, because of the unwillingness of Congress to approve the increased lending authority.

The only "extraordinary" assistance from the United States of which Latin America had been definitely assured was through the use of ERP dollars in "offshore" purchases. The Administration had asserted that some 30 to 40 percent of total purchases might be made outside the United States, and Latin American countries were expected to be large recipients of dollars from this source.⁶³ In reality, the vaunted assistance through ERP did not materialize, largely because of the release of pressure on United States production by bumper agricultural crops and the improvement of European production of items purchasable in South America. Moreover, many Latin Americans expected that ERP aid might have the effect that United States capital goods desired by Latin America would be in even shorter supply and that investment funds otherwise available to Latin America would be channeled into domestic production in the United States.⁶⁴

Welles, defended the view that the other American republics were entitled to large-scale economic support and that their demands could not be ignored without incurring their lasting ill will and jeopardizing [United States] leadership in the hemisphere."⁶⁵ In spite of these considerations, the official policy of the United States was that since its resources were not unlimited first priority had to be given to European recovery. Secretary of State Marshall stated (at Bogota) that the United States was prepared to assist Latin America but that it could finance "no more than a small portion of the vast development needed."⁶⁶ Further, the United States emphasized the desirability of the creation by Latin American countries of a "favorable climate" for private foreign investment and the presentation of carefully considered developmental projects to the International Bank. The Latin American countries were not receptive, in the main, to the "favorable climate" idea; but the International Bank did make a few more loans to the republics in 1949 and 1950.

Thus, though the United States had a long-standing tradition of regional cooperation with the Latin American republics, it made little effort to implement it in the financial field.⁶⁷ So long as all financial assistance was channeled through "functional" international organizations (those related to a single problem, world-wide in scope) there was little thought of "favoritism" to other countries outside South America, but when a concerted effort was made to help Europe (on a regional basis), jealousies arose immediately, and the United States did not make any comparable effort to dispel them. These results are further evidence of the impact of political considerations on international cooperation, especially when the latter is tied to financial aid distributed on regional lines.

Problems in international financial cooperation with the Far East arose in quite a different manner. Whereas Latin America had a close association with the United States but did not receive much economic assistance, some of the Far East countries received economic assistance even though there was no regional cooperation among those receiving aid nor any consideration by the United States of "regional" problems. Asiatic countries (chiefly China, Japan, and Korea) received the second largest amount of American economic aid provided any region during the period 1945-1950. But the Administration argued, correctly, that the Far Eastern nations were not developed sufficiently to profit by the type of economic cooperation facilitated by the Organization for European Economic Cooperation (OEEC). It did, however, make a token effort at a "regional" approach to aid in 1950 when it combined aid to Korea and China in one measure at the insistence of those members of Congress who were particularly interested in the Far East. The Administration was not enthusiastic over this approach, since it apparently thought that the elevation of assistance to Asia to a "regional" basis would be cause for greater insistence that aid be extended, and it was of the firm belief that, as a bulwark against Communism, Europe should be taken care of first. In addition, aid was not on a sufficiently large scale to make regional coordination worthwhile. The total volume of aid was less than one-ninth of that going to Europe after the initiation of ERP. U.S. economic cooperation with the nations of the Far East continued to be on a bilateral basis or through the international organizations established in the immediate postwar period although officials did state that regional association⁶⁸ would be looked on with favor by the United States.

See also Wallich, op. cit., p. 157: "For the United States, however, this lull in relations with Latin America, temporary though it may be, poses a rather serious question of principle. If the attitudes of our own public and the policies of our government are subject to considerable short-run fluctuations, how will it be possible to find international acceptance of American world leadership which circumstances seem to impose upon this nation? Clearly, there can be no confidence in any country's leadership unless its policies, whatever they may be, are clearly defined and reasonably stable."

The United States adopted a different approach to international financial cooperation in the case of Europe than with respect to Latin America and the Far East mainly because of its high estimate of the importance of aiding Europe, as compared to the developing areas of the world, in combatting Communism. This view is borne out by the increased interest of the United States in a regional grouping in Southeast Asia after the Communist attack on South Korea. There is, of course, nothing inherently contradictory in following a policy of international cooperation through "world-wide" agencies responsible for single problems and at the same time through regional associations directed at broader economic and political relations. However, the absence of a consistent policy toward a region (as with Latin America) and the probability that some members of a region will feel slighted (especially if the cooperation is tied to U. S. aid)⁶⁹ are important limitations on the regional approach, if an effort is to be made to reduce political forces in the decisions of the agencies involved. Experience also indicates that regionalism tied to aid has no geographical stopping point. Just as no nation within a region can be neglected, so must no area of the world be left out.⁷⁰

The regional approach to financial cooperation under the Mutual Security Program was adopted not only to treat similar economic and financial problems more effectively but also to support political and strategic objectives. The inclusion of all regions outside the Soviet orbit was largely justified by the political purpose of containing the spread of Communism. The United States, by 1951, had travelled a long way from its early anticipations of international financial cooperation on the purely technical level. Due partly to the East-West split and partly to the inherently political nature of intergovernmental decisions, international financial cooperation and foreign aid policies were directed at political, strategic, economic and financial problems of the various non-Soviet regions, thus integrating questions and considerations which should never have been separated.

V. SOME QUESTIONS FOR FURTHER CONSIDERATION

The experience of the postwar period shows clearly that political factors cannot be divorced from economic and financial policies and problems among nations, and there is an increasing recognition among governmental and private circles that problems in international relations must be faced on several fronts at once and through overall programs and policies. The marriage of political forces with financial and economic factors is difficult, however, because it must be done on two scenes successfully at the same time—the domestic and the international. Success in the former requires, for the United States, close cooperation among Congress, the Administration and official and private experts. Difficult problems arise in getting the public, in general, and Congress and the Administration, in particular, to see the problems in an inclusive context and to act in a fairly consistent fashion in both the political and economic realms. Success in the latter scene requires coordination of domestic policies of nations in the pursuit of agreed-upon ends. A major problem here is what institutional form the cooperation should take. Should it be of the early postwar “world-wide” character, with the institutions employing “constitutions” and criteria of action supposedly applicable to each and every member despite the widely diverse political and economic systems in each? Should it take the form of associations based on regional proximity, despite the ideological and economic conflicts within the regions as well as among them? Should it take any form which requires “ranking” of nations under common criteria or through voting schemes? Or, should it take the form of bilateral diplomacy or diplomatic bargaining (more or less on an ad hoc and flexible basis) among ideologically similar nations which have expressed a desire to pursue the same long-run principles of economic and political action?

⁷⁰ Witness the 1951-1953 presentation and justification of the Mutual Security Program by four regions covering the entire non-Soviet world.

Intergovernmental cooperation is required now more than during the nineteenth century because of the absence of the "automatic" mechanisms of commercial and financial adjustment and the former inducements to flow of goods and capital which were largely divorced from political positions of governments. Governments now act readily as buffers for the domestic economies and must take on a larger responsibility for coordination of their economies internationally. The problem of what is the most effective form of international financial (and economic) cooperation to gain the politico-economic goals of the Western nations is a crucial and as yet unanswered one.

NATURE OVER ART: NO MORE LOCAL FINANCE*

ROWLAND EGGER

University of Virginia

In 1866 an uncommonly knowledgeable gentleman, Alexis de Tocqueville by name, wrote as follows: "Je pense que dans les siècles démocratiques qui vont s'ouvrir l'indépendance individuelle et les libertés locales seront toujours un produit de l'art. La centralisation sera le gouvernement naturel." Four score and five years later a distinguished compatriot documented the triumph of nature over art which de Tocqueville contemplated as a possibility, and analyzed at some length the instrumentality through which le gouvernement naturel has established its primacy over les libertés locales. Professor Jean Boulouis has recently pronounced a plaintive requiem for French local self-government culminating in these words: "On pourrait presque avancer, sans beaucoup d'exagération, qu'il n'existe plus de finances locales, mais tout au plus une localisation des finances nationales."

The two most striking phenomena of local government finance in recent decades are, first, the absolute increase in the amount of money disbursed by local governments, and second, the substantial expansion in the proportion of local government disbursements financed from intergovernmental transfers of funds—grants-in-aid, shared taxes, and various other devices by which money is shifted from one level of government to another.

Before we get too far into the highly debatable notions and concepts to which discourse about local government finance inevitably gives rise, perhaps it would be just as well to suggest some of the areas that are reasonably non-controversial. It is, I take it, possible to approach this problem with a purely pragmatic attitude toward the proper level of municipal expenditure—to assume that local governments should spend whatever is needed efficiently and economically to perform the functions assigned to them. It is likewise reasonably clear that all our governments—national, state and local—belong eventually to the same shareholders, although the equities of some shareholders appear to be larger than others. It should also be possible to agree that even in a society embracing pluralistic values and highly complex aspirations it is desirable to keep the lines of responsibility and authority of our political institutions as clear and unequivocal as those commonly thought to be salutary in administrative organization.

Local government, as has been pointed out many times, is the institution which accommodates the special and the differentiating geographical elements in political life. The superior governments, operating over relatively large areas and relatively large populations, must function within a context of uniformity and of equal protection of the laws. They are unable to adapt themselves directly to the special and unique characteristics which local conditions and community organization produce. Local communities are different, both as to the type of services they require, and the amount of service. Some communities, for example, insist upon topping their primary and secondary educational systems with full-blown municipal universities. Others, equally wealthy and equally populous, settle for the more customary public school system involving eleven or twelve years of instruction. Sometimes private or sectarian educational institutions fill the need for local higher education; frequently, the need remains unfilled and even unfelt. Equally drastic differences in the felt and unfelt needs of communities exist in other functional areas—streets and highways, public safety, public welfare, sanitation, public health, recreation, and a dozen more.

However much variation in the standards at which services are maintained, there is a clearly evident uniformity in the services in which the center of gravity as far as actual operation is concerned is centered at the local level. While certain striking exceptions are in every category apparent, five functions are in overwhelming preponderance locally administered by local employees reporting to locally responsible governing bodies. These are (1) education, (2) welfare, (3) safety, (4) sanitation, health and hospitals, and (5) highways and public works. There are, except in a small number of states in which virtually complete financial responsibility for education, welfare, preventive public health, and highways has been assumed by the superior government, few localities in which these five activities are not locally administered and for which the aggregate operating cost amounts to less than 85 per cent of total expenditures for operations.¹

There are many reasons, not all of them based upon dispassionate analyses of relative efficiency and economy, for the maintenance of at least nominal local administrative responsibility. Part of the national bias in favor of local administration of certain of these services undoubtedly stems from the political philosophy enunciated by Mr. Jefferson, although it may be noted that Mr. Jefferson's ideas are most often honored in the breach in the very region of which he is the most distinguished and ornamental flower, and the most frequently quoted as well as the least adequately understood prophet. Partly it stems from historical accidents which became precedents which tend quickly to be identified with the eternal and immutable American Way. When we consider the relatively short time in which there has been any significant assertion of national and state interest in some of these functions which have been the concern of local communities for centuries, the apparently instinctive, or at least visceral, resistance to centralization becomes understandable. With respect to some of these functions it is still true that they seem to confer benefits only in the immediate area of performance and are thus logically a local responsibility. And in large part the preservation of local administration through which state and federal governments exert indirect influence on citizens is explained by the way in which political power is organized in the United States. Assertions of national or state interest must be made by legislatures whose locally-elected members seek to minimize disturbances in the political power structure of their districts and insist on channeling central government activity through local instrumentalities which they understand, or think they understand, how to control.²

Education. Let us examine first the factors which have served as the basis for at least nominally centering the control of public education at the local level. An educational historian who looks upon the fleshpots of federal subsidies for education and finds them beautiful, gives an historical explanation:

From its early days in seventeenth century Massachusetts American education has enjoyed a substantial measure of local autonomy. Although the Puritan theocracy, and later the state, enacted laws requiring localities to maintain schools, the details of carrying out such statutes were left almost entirely to the discretion of the community. As the country expanded and more settlements came into being—often at scattered points and at a distance from the older communities—school districts were established to minister to the educational needs of the new localities. Out of these arose the district school system, which still has its lingering survivors in many parts of the nation. Under the conditions that produced the district school system, the local government enjoyed a virtually unhampered freedom of action in education.³

Throughout the country, the local government, or school district (which is merely a special sort of local government) remains in immediate charge of public education. Although in a few states the district for school administration is the county, most schools remain neighborhood or community affairs. As recently as 1948, there were eleven states in which over 75 per cent of the school districts employed less than ten teachers. At that time, twenty-three states had more than 1,000 school districts, eleven had more than 4,000 districts, and five Midwestern states reported over 6,000 each.⁴

Although in most parts of the country the one-teacher school district seems to be passing, few Americans appear to be interested in more than minor consolidations at the local level. The report of a Hoover Commission task force undoubtedly mirrors the prevailing sentiment:

The American people have evolved a system of schools which make educational opportunities available on a scale unknown elsewhere in the world. This system is testimony to our belief in the worth of the individual, and the priority of the individual over the State. It is founded on the view that the development of individual intellect and understanding is essential to the health and development of our democracy. Historically, this program has been largely initiated and developed through energy and vision in local communities and the several States, by public and private enterprise. Because of our national cultural homogeneity we have developed a national type of education without the rigidity imposed by a uniform national system.

Our tradition of local control of education, an outgrowth of the isolation of the pioneer community, still exists, supported by the Tenth Amendment to the Constitution and by our basic belief that the local community and State must be the cornerstone for all matters concerning the welfare of the individual and his participation in democratic society. This tradition has been strengthened by our zeal for freedom and individual liberty. We have a compelling desire to keep power decentralized in all matters which concern influence over the thinking of the individual; we abhor deeply anything savoring of centralized or totalitarian control of thinking through education. Among the varied and numerous activities of government, there is none closer guarded from excessive Federal control than education. The decentralization of administration and control of public education should be maintained.⁵

Welfare. In the field of public welfare the doctrine of local control, although not local government control, is of equal dignity and long-standing to the principle of locally-centered administrative responsibility for education.⁶ Curiously enough, the Covenanter theologian and Edinburgh professor who is given credit for the "theory of locality," the Reverend Thomas Chalmers, was also an implacable enemy of governmental responsibility, which at the turn of the seventeenth century was local governmental responsibility in accordance with the Elizabethan Poor Law. His notions concerning the parochial organization of charity and care for the poor, and the philosophy of a small "geographical vineyard" as the area for the mutual assistance of human beings persisted and dominated thinking about and organization for welfare administration for centuries after the context of economic and social organization within which they might have had some validity had disappeared completely. Despite the phenomenal development of private philanthropy in the United States, and the piecemeal attempts to meet larger emerging problems of social welfare by state action, such as the passage of workmen's compensation legislation and other social insurance laws, virtually the entirety of public welfare responsibility remained in the hands of private and religious organizations and agencies, with local governments providing a modicum of institutional care at or slightly above the level of the poorhouse, until the depression beginning in 1929.

Even the depression did not shake the belief that interest in and administrative responsibility for public welfare should be essentially local. As the resources of private charity and philanthropy were exhausted, the local governments assumed the responsibility and increased their expenditures and expanded their welfare organizations. Not until late 1931 did any of the states undertake any poor relief programs, and even these were in the form of grants or loans to local relief agencies. In mid-1932, when the federal government signified its loss of faith in exhortation, public works, and predictions of prosperity "just around the corner" as depression stoppers by making funds available for direct relief, it chose the method of making RFC loans to state agencies with the clear understanding that these funds were to be merely supplemental but not in lieu of state and local financing. In the Roosevelt administration the funds available were drastically increased, and provided as grants rather than loans, but the theory of ultimate local responsibility was never officially abandoned. It seemed wholly natural that the federal government should not operate directly but work through the states, and that the state governments would in turn work through the local agencies; even Harry Hopkins had come to the federal government from a temporary job granting New York state funds to localities for relief, after many years of welfare activity in New York City.

Relief administration was built up in the United States in pyramid formation with thousands of local units covering the whole country tied together in forty-eight state administrations and through them to the Federal Emergency Relief Administration.⁷

This type of administrative experience was one of the ingredients in the thinking which led to the Social Security Act of 1935. The idea of a federal policy state and locally administered was thoroughly familiar and was adopted as the basic means of implementing the Act. Regardless of where the policies and the funds originate, it is the local welfare agency, in most cases, which takes them to the client.

It is not inaccurate to say that the Social Security Act changed in a very fundamental way the pattern of financing of public welfare costs, and universalized a minimum standard of benefits and subsequently a minimum standard of administration. It did not result generally in any considerable change in popular attitudes toward, or affect the continued acceptance of, the essential principles of the poor laws.⁸ As one writer points out:

The longevity of the poor laws has been phenomenal. While many of the Elizabethan principles are deterrents in a modern society one cannot ignore the fact that one of the basic principles—public responsibility for the care of dependent persons—is compatible with the democratic way of life. But along with this principle we have also been forced to continue others that are regressive and, from a social point of view, undesirable . . .

It was quite natural in the days of Queen Elizabeth that the localities should assume responsibility for the administration of public assistance. Local government was at that time the only area of government that directly reached the people . . .

Another Elizabethan principle that is unsuited to an industrial society is family responsibility. The poor laws in most of our states still specify that parents are to support their children and grandchildren and vice versa . . .

⁷ Marietta Stevenson, Public Welfare Administration (New York, 1938), p. 30.

⁸ The popular success of recent attacks on the confidentiality of the names of public assistance recipients is fresh evidence on this point.

The principle of legal settlement which was enacted in England in 1662 as a logical corollary of the principle of local responsibility makes each community responsible for the care of its own poor . . .

. . . the Elizabethan poor law principles with emphasis upon local responsibility, legal settlement as an eligibility requirement for public aid, and family responsibility are still with us . . . The "poor law mentality," as the Webbs characterized it, is still the guiding star of our general assistance programs in the various states; indeed, very few states have legislated the poor laws completely out of existence.⁹

Public Safety. The police and fire protection functions are deeply rooted in local communities and remain essentially local, in almost all aspects. The urban fire protection function is so obviously directly related to the protection of lives and property within the environment which urban conditions create that its performance by local quasi-public organizations or by the municipal governments themselves requires no elaborate explanation. It is interesting to note, however, that to the extent rural fire protection, which is 99.44 per cent forest fire protection, is available, it is in general organized under state supervision with an important part of the cost borne by the federal government.

The bias in favor of local control of the police function is likewise deeply rooted in American politics. After contrasting the development of local police institutions in England and America following their transplantation to the colonies, which led to a high degree of centralization in England and an equally high degree of localization in the United States, Bruce Smith points out:

All of the federal forces are controlled by the constitutional limits of federal jurisdiction over crimes, and for the most part are concerned with the enforcement of special groups of federal statutes directly relating to the governmental department within which each force operates. Thus through constitutional limitations and a series of historical accidents, the federal police system is rather closely limited . . .

Likewise in the sphere of state police there has been no real centralizing tendency. On the contrary, general police authority has been denied to many of the state forces, and when granted by statute in some jurisdictions it is exercised only within carefully defined limits. Even in those states which have conferred full police powers, severe restrictions upon the numerical strength of the state force sometimes have prevented application of a really vigorous law enforcement policy, while the evident antipathy of a considerable number of county, township, village and city police units operates to impose geographical limitations upon state police which were not contemplated by law.¹⁰

Smith tells us that in terms of the personnel available for performing the police function, the distribution is as follows: 120,000 local urban police, 14,000 state police, and 20,000 federal police.¹¹ No data seem to be available on the aggregate number of employees of sheriffs' offices, rural county police forces, and rural constables.

Local administration and control of the police function has been so seldom challenged that it is hard to find ringing declarations of the doctrine. It may be noted, however, that despite the histrionic successes of Senator Kefauver's investigations, his committee's suggestion of a federal commission to assist local crime watchdog commissions was not taken seriously.

Public Health. In the field of sanitation, preventive medicine, and hospitals the history of localization has been somewhat mixed. It seems essentially accurate to say that environmental sanitation has from the beginning been a matter of state law locally administered. In its inception, of course, it amounted to nothing more than legislation providing for the abatement of sanitary nuisances, such as the 1692 laws of the Province of South Carolina and of the Massachusetts Bay Colony for the prevention of infection associated with polluted air from garbage and slaughterhouses. Latterly more subtle approaches to environmental sanitation, involving the approval of water supplies and waste disposal systems and other types of regulatory and inspectional operations, have been added, but the locus of the administrative responsibility has in the main continued to rest with local health officers responsible to local boards of health or local governing bodies.¹²

With respect to hospitals, as Dr. Harry S. Mustard indicates, the beginnings of local government activity in this field were corollary to the establishment of almshouses and jails. In the early days almshouses, pesthouses and jails served relatively undifferentiated social functions in the American scene. In 1717 the Boston Selectmen were authorized to lease an acre of land for a contagious hospital. Philadelphia purchased Fisher's Island for a pesthouse in 1743. Charleston built an isolation hospital in 1752. These institutions were used mainly as refuges for shipboard victims of contagious diseases, rather than for the inhabitants of the localities in which they were situated.¹³

Although there are many exceptions, the report of the Commission on Hospital Care seems clearly to indicate that in the course of the years, state governments have assumed primary responsibility for the provision of hospital facilities for the mentally ill and for the tuberculous. The state governments ordinarily maintain general hospitals only as a necessary adjunct of their medical colleges, and do not attempt to provide comprehensive, statewide general hospital service. Local general hospital service remains an obligation of the local governments or of private organizations.¹⁴

Local activity in the field of preventive medicine is likewise sanctioned by long historical precedent. As Dr. Mustard points out:

There were two principal situations that precipitated early action in the interest of the public health. The first of these was the epidemic, the second the necessity for providing some sort of medical care for those who through age, poverty, or misbehavior had become wards of the community. Epidemics brought brisk but temporary action in the nature of a board of health. The need for medical care was met by a fairly continuing but limited and somewhat grudgingly provided physician for the poorhouse and jail.¹⁵

Baltimore appears to have been the first city to establish a health department, as distinguished from the sporadic ad hoc boards of health that were set up in times of epidemic. The Baltimore City Health Department was organized in 1798. Although a substantial amount of direct state and federal administrative machinery has since been established to deal with various aspects of preventive public health work, the burden continues mainly to be borne by local health officers responsible to local boards of health or local governing bodies. As the Hoover Commission Task Force phrased it:

The local unit is the ultimate health service agency and without it our ever-growing knowledge about health and disease would be of little practical use. When our entire population has available to it adequate local health services, then the framework of good health for all the people will have been established.¹⁶

In the field of public health, the local health agency seems to enjoy a sanctified status similar to that of the local school district. Congressional hearings in 1951 on a bill to authorize the Public Health Service to make grants to states for the purpose of bolstering up local health agencies produced surprisingly parallel statements from such varied sources as Oscar Ewing and the representatives of the state public health agencies, the American Public Health Association, and the American Medical Association, although there was the inevitable disagreement over the extent and nature of the controls which would go with the grants. On this occasion, Mr. Ewing said:

Many of the communicable diseases which endangered life in the past have been conquered, but the attack upon the principal disease enemies of the present . . . has just begun. The public is demanding protection against such hazards, and science is providing the methods. Local health units are essential mechanisms in bringing these methods to the people.¹⁷

In a presidential address before the American Public Health Association several years ago, a working public health officer commented in the following vein about one of the essential aspects of public health work:

. . . it has been said that public health is the sum total of the health of individuals . . . The education which produces it is therefore something which cannot be supplied to the populace in carload or truckload lots from National or State capitals. It must be dispensed to individuals in ounces, drams, and drops, and its dispensing to those who need it must be insured. This must be done by the local agency who can know how, when, and where individuals can be reached, and who can inspire the local community to want and to support facilities necessary to its general health preservation. It cannot be done in strict accord with any set pattern, for each community has its own characteristics and customs which no transcendentalism or government fiat may affect. It must come from local, voluntary reaction.¹⁸

the type of wealth traditionally relied upon for local taxation, hardly needs comment. Despite the movement toward highway centralization in the states, almost 85 per cent of total rural road mileage in the United States is still under local control and, for all practical purposes, 100 per cent of total urban mileage.¹⁹ Less than 8 per cent of all the nation's local or secondary road mileage currently receives federal aid.²⁰ Although the roads under direct state control are the most important and most costly ones, local governments still disburse almost half of our total expenditures on highways and actually raise themselves about half of what they spend.²¹

With respect to non-highway aspects of public works activities, the responsibility is predominantly local; indices of contracts let for public works, although fluctuating considerably from year to year, reveal on an average a rate of expenditure by local governments over twice that of the state governments.²² Of course, as contracting "owners" neither state nor local governments are in the running with the Army Engineers, the Department of Defense, and the Bureau of Reclamation.

II

It would take a very naive person indeed to be much impressed with the substance of "local" responsibility in many of the various aspects of these functions nominally carried on at the local level. It is not the aim, nor is it essential to the purpose of this discussion, to attempt an appraisal of the extent of local self-determination in the performance of any of the functions. Of much more importance is an understanding of the political and administrative rationale of developments which have admittedly shifted the center of policy and standards to a superior governmental level, but which have meticulously maintained doctrinal adherence to local self-government and continued almost exclusively to utilize the local governments as operating instrumentalities.

The history of contemporary public education in the United States is marked by a number of significant facts. One is the substantial elevation of standards in the public school system—the elevation of professional requirements for teachers, the lengthening and standardization of the school term, the enrichment of the curriculum, the expansion of the mission of the public schools, and the leveling-up of educational facilities in the underdeveloped areas. These changes may or may not be productive of improvements of note in the manners, morals or perceptions of the boys and girls, but as professional educators rate progress, we have progressed. Another significant fact is the absolute increase in expenditures for public schools. A third significant fact is the shift in the pattern of school support.

It is not unreasonable to suppose that all of these things are interrelated. The elevation of standards in the public school system is, in part, a consequence of the profound conviction of education, which in most of the United States has been at least as strong as the conviction of sin, and about which we have managed to do a good deal more. In larger part, however, the elevation of standards in the public school system is due to the fact that it has gotten almost completely into the hands of the educational bureaucracy. There is no sector of American social organization in which, for all practical purposes, the separation of powers has so completely disappeared.

In elevating the standards of the public school system, the prophets of progress have wisely refrained from tampering with the ark of the covenant. The symbols have been preserved, and the rituals carefully respected. But the substance of authority has passed out of the hands of local school boards, local governing boards, and even out of the hands of local school administrators. The means by which this end has been achieved is the grant-in-aid. In the last thirty years expenditures for public schools have increased five-fold, and in the last five years they have virtually doubled—perhaps the only civil function to keep pace with the consumer price index. The more significant change, however, has been in the pattern of finance. Twenty years ago the states paid about 20 per cent of the total cost of public education; ten years ago they paid about 30 per cent; now they pay about 40 per cent. And the end is nowhere in sight. Local contributions have declined proportionately, since all this has been achieved entirely without the assistance of the federal government.²³

Viewed in the large, it seems that the professional educators have undertaken, with a remarkable degree of success, to push up the standards of the public school system at a rate somewhat beyond either the present fiscal ability or the social and political sophistication of the local governments. The fact that the grant-in-aid systems almost universally emphasize standards of expenditure rather than standards of achievement, and contain virtually no elements of equalization, suggests that what is being overcome at the local level is a certain social and political backwardness rather than actual inability to meet the costs of better public school systems from local funds, although it must be remembered that limitations upon local taxing power frequently prevent local governments from doing as much as they are able and willing to call upon their constituencies to support.

The situation in the field of public welfare is generally similar, except that the federal government is readily at hand for those seeking a whipping-boy to blame for the erosion of the substance of local responsibility and local control. However, it is interesting to note that no less than in public education the symbols and rituals have been carefully preserved. The Social Security Act itself actually centralizes the administration of only one of the categories—

Old Age and Survivors Insurance—while the other instrumentality in which the administrative arguments for federal operations are overwhelming—the Employment Service—was hastily returned to the states despite the fact that its operation by the federal government during the war clearly demonstrated the superiority of national administration. Its corollary categorical assistance—Unemployment Compensation—has of course never been nationally administered, although the completeness of national control reduces state authority to a very gossamer thread. Nevertheless, in practically all the states local welfare officials responsible to local boards of public welfare or local governing bodies bear the burden of administering old age assistance, aid to dependent children, and aid to the blind, in addition to those welfare functions not provided for in the Social Security Act.

The Social Security Act was, of course, the great national instrumentality for the establishment of minimum standards throughout the country for the alleviation of a number of the most important causes of human suffering and maladjustment. While its sponsors were politically sagacious enough to preserve the symbols, the purpose of the Act was such as inherently to limit the amount of free play which could be permitted in local administration. The Act was far in advance of the political and social sophistication of large parts of the country. And within limits, the standards it prescribed were likewise standards not of achievement but of expenditure. Up to a point, the more you spend the more you get. As in other efforts to persuade state and local governments to operate beyond their current condition of political enlightenment, the grant-in-aid proved to be a necessary part of the plan. By definition, its purpose in such cases is to promote expenditure, not to equalize the burden.

The situation in public health, despite the influence of federal grants and expenditures under certain titles of the Social Security Act and other authorities, is quite the reverse. In the last decade public health expenditures have more than quadrupled, but in the process the federal proportion has declined from about 46 per cent to 29 per cent, while state and local expenditures, principally local, have increased from 54 to 71 per cent. The local governments are, in fact, financing from local sources almost half of the total operating costs of public health departments, exclusive of sanatoria and hospitals. It is interesting to note that public health expenditures from local sources have increased eight-fold in the last decade.²⁴

The factors which have produced a reasonable degree of integration in health administration are apparently professional rather than financial. Most of the state health departments are organized to provide special services to local health departments or to local governments, or to deal with special aspects of public health work, such as industrial hygiene, etc. The relationships of staff and command in such circumstances tend to become somewhat blurred, but in their essence they tend to rest on the authority of ideas rather than the authority either of men or of money.

²⁴ Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government, op. cit., p. 164.

In the field of highways, which represents the major share of local public works, it seems likewise clear that the major integrative factor is technological rather than financial. The percentage of federal money involved in aggregate federal-state-local expenditures for the construction of highways is hardly large enough to conclude major issues of policy or management at either state or local levels. On the other hand, the practical utility of maintaining uniform standards of engineering and design on connecting segments of the national highway network is an argument solid enough to overcome the rugged individualism of almost any state or local public works engineer or governing body. There have been times, and indeed there are and have been certain areas, in which this observation is not valid, but (made-work construction in time of depression and road construction for defense access in time of national emergency aside) it is clear that federal grants-in-aid have not been primary determinants in highway development. Moreover, when we come to the sharing of moneys for highway purposes between state and local governments, it is equally significant to note that in the vast majority of states the funds come to the localities in terms which give the state authorities very little control over engineering and design standards, and in many cases little control over whether shared motor-fuel taxes, for example, are even devoted to highway purposes.²⁵

As to other public works, the extent of supervision and control has varied enormously with circumstances. During the period when the federal government was promoting construction projects with grants and loans, federal approval of engineering and design specifications was relatively extensive and meticulous. In many states today, state supervision and control of local school construction plans is common, whether or not state financial assistance is extended.²⁶ Hospital construction under the Hill-Burton Act is generally subject to supervision by the state hospital construction agencies which the Act makes mandatory, although the amount of actual federal control over plans and specifications appears to be nominal. In the main, however, local public works operations appear to be free of significant external controls.

We have now examined in a general way the political and administrative folklore which has produced patterns of apparently accepted thought about the proper geographical level for the performance of certain important public services. We have also examined the way in which such factors as technological development, professionalization of administration, up-grading of standards, and other influences have affected the real locus of authority and responsibility in these services. We have had opportunity to observe that popular stereotypes in federal-state-local fiscal relations apply with a good deal less than complete uniformity—that grants-in-aid do not inevitably produce shifts in policy control in direct proportion which the amount of the grant bears to the total cost of the function, and that in some cases a rather high degree of integration of policy has come about in consequence of factors only indirectly associated with the availability of grants. On the whole, the stars in the federal-state-local fiscal and administrative firmament seem rather remarkably movable.

Let us briefly turn our attention to the political and administrative folklore of revenue source allocation. The cardinal principle in local taxation in the United States is apparently the article of faith relating to the appropriateness of property taxation for local purposes. In some states this has been carried to the extent of constitutional and exclusive allocation of this source to the uses of local governing bodies. In other states, by custom the central government has vacated property taxation in order to permit its unobstructed occupation by the local governments. In part this has been based upon the obvious administrative suitability of property taxation, especially real property taxation, to an area of limited geographical jurisdiction. Land and houses stay put. In part it has been based upon the contribution which many of the municipal services make to the improvement in the value of property. In part it has resulted from the desire of many state tax authorities to eliminate or minimize state-local stresses incident upon equalization. But whatever the motivation, property is principally taxed by local governments, and property forms the principal tax revenue source of local governments.

Latterly, local revenue sources have in many sections of the country been liberalized, or at least changed. Broader—indeed, in some cases, as subsequent experience proved, entirely too broad—powers with respect to the levy of various sorts of excise, income, and license taxes have been extended to local governments, especially urban local governments. In part this broadening of the base of local taxation has been necessitated by the relative decline of property as a significant index of taxpaying capacity. In the modern world, there are too many other forms of wealth, and too many more productive forms of wealth, to justify the large degree of reliance upon property taxation which had come to be placed upon it in the local tax structure. In part it must be regarded as due to the political effectiveness of the organized real estate interests in the determination of local tax policy; local governments, not unnaturally, have always been sensitive to this segment of the local economy, and a great many local governments tend normally to be caudal appendages of the real estate business. In any case, a fairly effective halt on further expansion of property taxation in any measure even remotely adequate to meet rising costs in the established local services, and fiscal requirements for new services, appears to have been called.

In general, the results of the extension of local taxing power have been disappointing. In some states authorities were conferred upon localities clearly beyond the ability of any local government effectively to administer. Municipal net income taxes, to take an example, appear to be of this character; municipalities do not have access to the records of many persons and corporations doing business and deriving profits from activities within the municipality which are required effectively to enforce a net income tax. Business and occupational licenses, to take another example, in the absence of records available usually only to the state, must utilize indicators so crude—gross receipts, as a general rule—that rates must be kept at purely nominal levels to avoid confiscation in particular cases. Many excise taxes can be levied only at nominal rates in areas of small geographical jurisdiction if wholesale avoidance or evasion is to be forestalled.

There can be little quarrel with the generally accepted bias favoring the preponderant or exclusive taxation of property, particularly real property by local governments, although as long as intergovernmental transfer of funds continues to be practiced in any significant degree it is clearly impossible for superior governments to divest themselves of responsibility for assuring that the necessary preconditions for effective taxation of property are maintained in the localities, and that this source is in fact called upon to bear a just portion—whatever that essentially political determination shall be—of the costs of local government. Nevertheless, it is quite clear that property taxes, however effectively and equitably utilized, cannot support the entirety of the increase in local government costs, to say nothing of contributing anything to the development of relative fiscal self-sufficiency at the local level.

On the other hand, as experience has demonstrated, there are limits upon the possibility of strengthening, without the support of technical assistance, the revenue positions of local governments through the introduction of more sensitive newer local taxes, because of the special need which local government has for fiscal stability, because of the restrictions on administrative efficacy inherent in relatively small size as well as limited geographical jurisdiction, and because of the lack of ancillary regulatory powers essential to the enforcement of many of the newer types of taxes.

Faced with these facts, the states have been confronted with two alternatives: (1) technical assistance could be provided to the localities in an attempt to maximize the effectiveness of local sources, or of sources which might legitimately be made available locally if such technical assistance were available; or (2) raising the necessary funds from state sources and distributing them to the localities in the form of grants-in-aid or shared taxes. In fact, both types of action have been embraced. The work of many of the state tax commissions in the field of property taxation has been, and is, of the nature of technical assistance to the localities in the improvement of property assessment, and some states give the localities a limited amount of technical assistance in connection with non-property taxes. In the main, as is clearly indicated by the expansion of intergovernmental transfers of funds, grants-in-aid and shared taxes have been relied upon instead.

Truth, like virtue, seems to be as relative in the field of public affairs, including public finance, as it is almost everywhere else. "There is nothing good or bad but thinking makes it so," is as true of subsidies, grants and shared taxes as it was of manners and morals at Elsinore. And this is certainly not the place to reargue the case for and against grants-in-aid.²⁷ All of the logic adduced in support of intergovernmental transfers of funds has been valid and invalid at certain times in history and with respect to certain types of grants. All of the arguments made in opposition to grants-in-aid have been true and untrue under certain circumstances and with respect to certain sorts of subsidies. In general, it is true that the legal situation confronted by a federal government engenders resort to and continuance of grants-in-aid for the stimulation of programs that must, for constitutional or over-riding political reasons, be carried out by state and local instrumentalities in order to establish and maintain national minimal service standards. What the federal government cannot command it must purchase, and the grant-in-aid is the technique by which state and local concurrent and coordinate action is bought.

The legal situation with respect to state persuasion and coercion of local activity is, of course, quite different, but the political climate has many points of similarity. Few state legislatures would venture to impose mandatory duties involving substantial expenditure upon local governments without at the same time sweetening the pot with additional state funds. Indeed, almost every session of every state legislature is confronted with very steep demands from local government for funds merely to offset the effects of inflation on current programs. And governorships, formerly bought and sold in the smoke-filled back rooms, it is alleged by malefactors of great wealth, are now more likely to be openly and unashamedly bargained for at the state-local relations counter, with wampum made up of intricate old plans and imaginative new programs for pumping more and more state money into local coffers.

So it is probably not very realistic to think of anything like a drastic reversal of public policy which would eliminate intergovernmental transfers of funds and which would establish each level of government on its own discrete financial bottom. It is worth while, however, to take a brief look at the nature of prevailing grant-in-aid programs and their administrative consequences. In the first place, most grants are essentially stimulative of expenditure; as has been pointed out before, the standards they erect are standards of money matched, not missions accomplished. It is of some interest that the only federal grant-in-aid proposal which significantly related its payments to local ability and local effort was the ill-fated Taft bill for federal assistance to education. At the state level the situation is somewhat better, although in the field of educational subsidies the Council of State Governments reports that in 1948 only ten states distributed as much as 75 per cent of educational grants on general-purpose equalization formulae,²⁸ and that 25 states utilized crude assessed values for educational grant equalization,²⁹ which is worse than no equalization at all. In most other state grant systems, and obviously in shared-tax systems, there is no element of equalization visible to the naked eye.

In these circumstances it is not to be wondered that functional pressures have been set up in local government which effectively nullify integrated and responsible local administration. When it comes to budgetary matters, most local governing bodies are currently little more than trustees in bankruptcy for a small group of residual local functions. The major decisions have already been made in the light of the compelling argument not of local community needs, but of optimum possibilities in securing matching state and federal funds. Since no premium is set upon efficiency, most grant systems have in effect underwritten the continuance of archaic local governmental jurisdictions and irresponsible local administrative structure and procedures.

Frustrating as is the experience of living in and working with community institutions in which responsibility is as difficult to fix, and influence as difficult to exert, as it is in most of the local school systems and welfare departments with which I am acquainted, it is still true that in the aggregate the present allocation of functions offers a better opportunity of achieving a reasonably satisfactory community life than if functional operations had been kicked upstairs along with a large part of the financial burden. It may be sometimes difficult to find our way around in our untidy and illogical county and municipal household, but it is also true that most of the furniture and utensils we need, and for that matter a fair stock of vittles, are there when we are able eventually to find them.

Let us admit that we may, in the future, desire to utilize grants-in-aid for stimulative purposes, and even to distribute them on the basis of expenditure standards. We may even wish on occasion to play fast and loose with principles of equalization. The problem is not one of inviolate adherence to a particular doctrine of intergovernmental fiscal relations, but of intelligent use and modification of systems of intergovernmental fiscal relations in accord with reasonably well agreed general social and political objectives. In short, when stimulation is required, then grants-in-aid, along with interest rates and all other suitable and available forms of social control, should be utilized to stimulate. When stimulation is not required, the system of intergovernmental fiscal relations should be adapted and modified to support consolidation, economy and equalization of administrative services and costs. The fact that in many of the social services, and in other local services as well in the target areas, there are standards below which the nation and the states cannot permit the local government to fall should not imply that these exigencies cannot be met without losing integrity, unity and self-reliance within the institutions of local administration. Let me suggest a few of the ways in which we might face ourselves in the right direction for achieving this end.

²⁸ Council of State Governments, The Forty Eight State School Systems (Chicago, 1949), pp. 128-31 and Table 55, p. 231.

First, with respect to those services in which minimum state-wide or national standards must be maintained, let the superior governments state the requirements in terms of objective service standards, rather than standards of expenditure which are in reality not performance standards at all.

Second, let the states provide technical assistance for assuring, and in fact assure, that proper and equitable use is being made of property taxes by local governments.

Third, let the states provide technical assistance and, in appropriate cases, legal and enforcement support, which will permit effective utilization of newer local taxes, such as business taxes and excises at rates and with economic indicators which will assure progressivity and at the same time secure the just and equitable utilization of these revenue sources.

Fourth, in the event that property taxes at a true rate which defines the equitable state-wide sacrifice, and the additional local taxes at the standard prescribed rates, will not produce a sum equal to the cost of maintaining at the prescribed state-wide or nation-wide standards the essential services; then a local supplemental tax, up to a specified percentage, against the state personal net income tax collected in the locality should be permitted.

Fifth, in the event that all of these measures do not produce funds sufficient to operate the essential services at the prescribed standards, block grants should be made in an amount sufficient when added to locally raised revenues to operate the essential services at the prescribed standards. Such block grants from state to local governments, and from federal to state governments, should seek to equalize, within minimum standards, the resources available for the operation of the essential services.

Sixth, standards for the use of property taxes, as well as standards for the use of the newer local taxes, should be stated in terms definitive of the general equitable rate of sacrifice, but not in terms of maxima. Localities which desire to operate essential services above the prescribed standards, or to undertake other services, should be permitted and encouraged to develop and expand their operations in accordance with the demands made upon them by their constituencies.

STATE ADMINISTRATION OF NATURAL RESOURCES IN THE WEST*

VINCENT OSTROM
University of Oregon

West of the one hundredth meridian, the average annual rainfall is generally less than twenty inches except for higher mountainous areas and the humid area west of the Cascade range in western Washington and Oregon and an area west of the Coast range in northwestern California. With less than twenty inches of rainfall, irrigation and dry-farming methods are required to supplement and conserve the native moisture if successful crops are to be produced. At twenty inches of rainfall successful agriculture is subject to extreme hazards from frequent droughts that call to mind the tragedy of crop failure and dust storms. In the humid Pacific Northwest the dry summer climate introduces another variable limiting successful agricultural production without supplementary water.

American institutional arrangements, sustenance patterns and resource policies were conceived in humid England and developed in the humid regions of the United States. However, the general aridity of the West stands in marked contrast to the humidity that prevailed in the physical environment where American social institutions and traditions were formed. This alteration of the physical environment has caused an important shift in the balance of human ecology requiring significant modification in institutional arrangements and social policy, especially in regard to the control and development of natural resources.¹

This paper is concerned primarily with an analysis of the role that state governments have played in meeting the peculiar requirements of western resources development. At the outset, however, it must be recognized that the states have operated under a fundamental handicap. While the control and development of water resources is the critical factor in the resources policies of the West, little consideration seems to have been given to structuring the area of the states so as to permit effective control of watershed areas. The rectangular shape of most western states reflects the surveyor's defiance of land forms in drawing state boundaries. Where state boundaries do respond to land forms, the channel of a major river most frequently provides the boundary marker,

* This paper was prepared for the panel on state administration of natural resources at the American Political Science Association annual meeting, Buffalo, New York, August 26, 1962. New developments, especially in state legislation during the 1953 session of state legislatures, are not reported in this paper. However, the few changes which might be made in factual observation do not alter the analyses and conclusions.

thereby eliminating the possibility of development by a single state. The Central Valley of California is the only major hydrologic unit in the West that is confined to the jurisdiction of a single state. Otherwise only an occasional tributary, such as the Willamette River in Oregon or the Gila River in Arizona, affords opportunity for systematic development on a comprehensive basis by the state as a unit of government.

Despite the lack of attention given to the shaping of an adequate political instrument for the control of the critical factor in the ecology of the West, major responsibilities in the development of water resources were relegated to the states. Subtle differences in the common law, such as distinctions between a usufruct and title-in-fee-simple, resulted in a differentiation between water and land in the administration of the public domain. Title to land and the authority to control the land in the public domain have generally been recognized as inhering in the federal government. On the other hand, control over the acquisition and administration of water rights has generally been recognized as a function of the state governments. Consequently a significant dichotomy of state and federal responsibilities was permitted to develop that has ramified through every aspect of land and water resources administration in the West.

The first major change wrought by the western states in the traditional American institutions to control water resources was the abandonment of the common law doctrine of riparian rights and its replacement by the new doctrine of prior appropriation rights. Significantly, the new doctrine was derived from the practice of miners, who, in making claims to precious metals, vested rights on the basis of first come, first served.

The prior appropriation doctrine of water rights permits full utilization of a stream with an assured supply to prior appropriators without the threat of new competitors gaining rights to the water supply simply by the circumstances of location in relation to the course of a stream. The use of water under appropriation is not restricted to lands adjacent to water courses as established in riparian laws. Except for California, all of the western states rely primarily upon the system of prior appropriation in the determination of water rights to surface waters. However, California is still confronted with serious problems arising from conflicts over riparian rights in the development of water exchange arrangements in the Central Valley and in some of the basins of Southern California.²

Shortly after the prior appropriation doctrine had been firmly established in the law of western states as a basis for determining water rights, new devices were invented to permit careful control over the actual appropriation of water by water users. Instead of relying exclusively upon the courts as instruments for resolving conflicts over water rights, western states, beginning with Wyoming, placed administrative responsibility for the supervision and regulation of appropriations with the state engineer. Appropriation claims were filed with the state engineer instead of the county recorder. The amount of the appropriation was subject to review in terms of the beneficial use of the water, the actual needs for water, diligence in utilization of water, and the amount of water subject to potential appropriation. By the elimination of paper claims to water, the control of appropriations to prevent filings beyond the potential supplies, and the control of unreasonable waste by prior appropriators, the state was able to avoid open warfare among water appropriators and to establish orderly relationships among water users without their having to resort constantly to expensive litigation.³

With the increased efficiency of pumping and the greater demand for agricultural production, the western states have been confronted with a new problem of water rights to underground water supplies. Underground waters are more difficult to administer because of the difficulty of measuring safe yield and determining the nature of the underground water supply. Consequently some of the western states, instead of relying upon the appropriation principle, have permitted rights to vest in owners of overlying lands. In some areas, notably in Arizona, users have pumped water substantially beyond the permanent safe yield of the underground basins.⁴ Unless the federal pork-barrel is used to "rescue" users making overdrafts on underground basins, serious human tragedies can be expected.

Utilization of water resources required the development of new social agencies in the West. As Frederick Jackson Turner has observed, "... no conquest was possible by the old individual pioneer method ... expensive irrigation works must be constructed, cooperative activity was demanded in the utilization of water supply, and capital beyond the reach of the farmer was required."⁵ Although many early irrigation projects were undertaken by individual entrepreneurs, cooperatives and local public organizations have generally served as the agencies to provide the necessary "cooperative labor and capital" for local irrigation works.

Mutual water companies were organized by early settlers in Utah and Southern California as semi-public agencies to provide irrigation water to farming communities on a cooperative basis. Similar cooperatives have been developed in other states. Beginning in 1887 with the Wright Act of California, western states organized public irrigation districts as special agencies with powers of taxation and eminent domain to provide for the construction and operation of irrigation works. Local government agencies for water resources administration have multiplied until most western states have irrigation, flood control, drainage, water, and utility districts.

The organization of these new local public agencies for the development of water resources and the new system for the appropriation of water permitted people to pool their wealth to develop the country. However, the lack of adequate skill and competent advice in the design of waterworks and the development of irrigation systems produced many poorly conceived projects planned without adequate consideration of either physical or economic feasibility. Consequently many irrigation districts defaulted on the repayment of their bonded indebtedness, creating serious doubt as to the soundness of local resources development. On the other hand, many local irrigation districts have been efficiently managed and operate as successful agencies today.

By the early part of the twentieth century most of the water projects susceptible of development on a small scale by local organizations of irrigators and water users had been undertaken. To undertake large-scale projects which these groups were not able to handle, the Reclamation Service, a federal agency, was established in 1902. Most western states have not advanced far beyond the function of providing the permissive conditions for the development of federal waterworks projects and serving as special pleaders before federal agencies to undertake local development.⁶ In some states, notably California, the state government has served as the agency within which resource planners have tried to come to grips with problems of comprehensive planning for multiple-purpose water resources development. California's efforts in this direction provide an interesting chapter in natural resources administration by a state government, since that state has the necessary conditions—wealth and control over a large integral hydrologic unit—for active state participation in the construction and operation of its water resources.

In 1919, Robert B. Marshall, who for many years was the Chief Geographer in charge of the Topographic Branch of the U. S. Geological Survey, proposed a plan for the comprehensive development of the water resources of the Sacramento-San Joaquin Rivers in the Central Valley by capturing the flood discharge in a number of large reservoirs on tributary streams and on the upper Sacramento River.⁷ By a system of canals along the edge of the foothills skirting the valley floor it would be possible to divert surplus waters to fertile valley lands for irrigation. The Marshall Plan anticipated the irrigation of 12,000,000 acres of land. In addition water would be used to generate electrical power to help establish the feasibility of the total project.⁸

⁷ The Marshall Plan was preceded by important preliminary investigations by William

After an intensive effort supported by public power groups, the League of California Municipalities, and farm and labor organizations, the Marshall Plan was rejected by the California legislature. Instead, legislation was enacted and $200,000 appropriated to initiate an investigation of California water resources. The supporters of the Marshall Plan carried the measure to the people at three different elections as an initiative proposal for a California Water and Power Act to create a state Water and Power Commission, modeled after the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission. These efforts were defeated after some of "the most bitterly contested political struggles ever staged in California."⁹

The water investigations inaugurated in 1921 by the state engineer were continued by private subscription after the legislature failed to renew the appropriation in 1923. In 1925, during an increasingly serious drought, an additional $150,000 was appropriated. By 1927 the broad features of a state water plan began to take form; and in 1931 the State Water Plan, together with plans for undertaking the Central Valley Project as the initial unit of the plan, were completed.

In a background of drought and depression, and following the inauguration of the Boulder Canyon Project by the Bureau of Reclamation and the Colorado River Aqueduct by the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California, the California legislature authorized the Central Valley Project by enactment of the Central Valley Project Act of 1933.¹⁰ The legislation was upheld by the voters of California over opposition by the power companies and sectional interests at a special referendum election on December 17, 1933.

The Central Valley Project Act provided for the creation of a Water Project Authority to construct, operate and administer the project. Revenue bonds to the maximum amount of $170,000,000 were authorized for the construction of (1) the Shasta Dam on the Sacramento River, (2) the San Joaquin Pumping System to transport water from the lower Sacramento in the San Joaquin delta, with canals to Fresno Slough for the irrigation of lands in the northwestern portion of San Joaquin Valley, and (3) Friant Dam on the San Joaquin River with canals diverting water south to the Bakersfield area for the irrigation of lands in southern and eastern San Joaquin Valley.

Instead of utilizing the revenue bonds to undertake the Central Valley Project as a state venture in water resources administration, the California Water Project Authority turned to the United States government to secure federal financing and construction. In 1935 the Central Valley Project was authorized as a federal project with administrative responsibility for construction and operation vested in the Bureau of Reclamation. The Central Valley Project has since been pursued as a federal undertaking.

Early contracts between the California Water Project Authority and the Bureau of Reclamation contemplated an agreement upon a new contract to provide for:

- (a) The operation and maintenance by the authority of useful units of the project, upon presenting assurance of payment satisfactory to the United States of the cost thereof.
- (b) Appropriate payment by the authority to the United States for expenditures in construction of the project.¹¹

By 1939 the Secretary of Interior was rejecting overtures by the Water Project Authority for negotiation of such a contract with the observation that "the Central Valley Project is a federal undertaking to be administered in accordance with Reclamation Law."¹²

After nearly a half-century of effort, California had planned a well integrated program of multiple-purpose water resource development but withdrew from financial, construction and operating responsibilities in favor of federal action. Dissatisfaction with federal administration and control of the Central Valley Project was soon indicated by state officials, including C. A. Griffith, chairman of the California Water Resources Board, who observed:

At first it was hoped that the interest of these federal agencies in California's water problems would relieve the state of much of its responsibility in that connection.

Unfortunately, these hopes did not materialize. Piecemeal planning at the federal level neither solved our problems nor pleased the people of our state. In fact, it only further complicated an already complex and confusing situation.

We have made costly mistakes by taking half measures. In the light of history we are convinced that our basic planning must be done by our own state engineer's staff, men who know our basic requirements, our California water laws, and have a clear understanding of our water rights.¹³

In 1945, the California legislature adopted the State Water Resources Act to authorize a state-wide investigation of water resources as the basis for the formulation of a plan for the full development of the state's water resources,

"to meet present and future needs for all beneficial purposes and uses in all areas of the state."¹⁴ In the meantime, action has been taken which points toward state assumption of a more active role in water resources administration in California. The Feather River Project and Sacramento-San Joaquin Delta Diversion Projects have been authorized as a part of the state Central Valley Project, "separate and apart from all or any other units thereof."¹⁵ Limitations on the amount of revenue bonds that may be issued for the development of the Central Valley Project were repealed. Finally the Water Project Authority was requested to report on the feasibility of state ownership and operation of the Central Valley Project.

No one can predict the outcome of these developments. This may be the beginning of a systematic effort by a state government to undertake multiple-purpose development of its water resources; or it may be simply another chapter in the struggle of those opposing such federal policies as the 160-acre limitation on reclamation projects and preference for public agencies in the sale of federally-generated hydro-electric power, and the introduction of an additional agency in the Sacramento-San Joaquin watershed operating "separate and apart from all or any other units."

Other western states have been even less inclined than California to undertake multiple-purpose development of water resources. In the Willamette River basin, an integral hydrologic unit within the state of Oregon, the legislature of Oregon has created a Willamette River Basin Commission. However, this agency was created at the instigation of the Army Corps of Engineers with authority to act for the state of Oregon in the promotion of the Willamette River Project as a federal project. The nature of its program of action is indicated by the statement:

If we are to make this great river valley the garden spot it should be with all of the benefits we have been promised, we are going to be obliged to keep up a continued fire of messages to our senators and congressmen and others in Washington.¹⁶

In Oregon, Washington, and Arizona, state governments have been the center of important deliberation on public policies regarding state development of water power. In both Oregon and Washington, the state Granges spearheaded movements to establish a comprehensive program, similar to the California Water and Power Act, for the development of hydro-electric power during the late 1920's and the early 1930's. Initial efforts in Oregon to secure the adoption of a comprehensive initiative proposal in 1926 were unsuccessful. But public power advocates in both states succeeded in winning approval for initiative measures authorizing the creation of local utility districts during the early 1930's. In 1932, Oregon adopted a constitutional amendment which permitted state development of water power with authority for both the generation and transmission of electrical energy.

With the advent of the New Deal in 1933, Bonneville Dam and Grand Coulee Dam were authorized by the federal government as multiple-purpose projects on the Columbia River. This gave new impetus to public power groups to secure public transmission facilities for the new power potentials being created by these federal projects. In Oregon legislation was adopted creating a state power commission with authority to undertake the generation, transmission, and distribution of hydro-electric power. The power companies had the Grange Power Bill referred to the people at the 1934 general election. It was defeated by a narrow margin. Efforts in 1935 and 1936 to secure approval of a state power commission were vetoed by the governor and defeated as an initiative proposal. In Washington, the efforts of the Grange in 1936 to secure an amendment to the state constitution authorizing the state to construct and operate a power transmission system were defeated at the polls. The problem of providing transmission facilities from Bonneville and Grand Coulee dams was finally solved by the establishment of Bonneville Power Administration, a federal agency with general responsibility for the development of regional transmission facilities in the Pacific Northwest.¹⁷

The public utility district laws authorized by the states of Oregon and Washington continue to serve as the basis of public power policies in those states. In Oregon, a state Hydro-Electric Commission was created, but as a regulatory agency without operating responsibilities. The Peoples Utility Districts have been organized in only eight instances in Oregon. Only four exist as operating agencies today. The Peoples Utility District Act requires that a district tender a deposit in the amount of the value claimed together with attorney fees in any condemnation proceedings to acquire a utility system.¹⁸ This practically precludes use of the power of eminent domain in the acquisition of an existing utility.

In Washington, thirty-two public utility districts have been organized and twenty-one are active operating units. The organic act provides ample authority for the public utility district to condemn existing utility systems, but the comparatively small size of the districts, which do not extend beyond county boundaries, has created problems through the piecemeal "cannibalization" of the large private utility systems, which causes excessive severance charges.¹⁹ Efforts of Skagit County Public Utility District No. 1 to purchase the entire power system of the Puget Sound Power and Light Company and to contract for re-sale of facilities to other public utility districts were set aside by the Supreme Court of Washington as exceeding the authority of a public utility district to operate outside its boundaries.²⁰

In response to this situation the Washington legislature in 1949 authorized two or more public utility districts to exercise jointly all power granted to any district. At the same time the Washington Water Power Commission was created with ample authority to investigate and undertake projects for hydro-electric power development.²¹ Through one pretext or another, the governor has declined to make any appointments to the commission and the statute remains inoperative.

In contrast to power developments in the northwest states, Arizona in 1944 created a state agency, the Arizona Power Authority, to receive and wholesale the electrical energy allocated to the state of Arizona from Hoover Dam and other federal hydro-electric projects on the Colorado River.²² The authority is given ample power to construct and operate transmission facilities with the use of revenue bonds to finance improvements. In conformity with federal policies, the Arizona Power Authority Act gives preference to public bodies and co-operatives and requires that the price benefits of low-cost power be passed on to the ultimate consumers in the sale of Colorado River power.

The results of Arizona's experience will be interesting to observe as the state develops its program. The private power companies have vigorously opposed policies of public preference and rate controls. As a possible effort to circumvent these policies, N. D. Houghton, a commissioner of the Arizona Power Authority, has reported the execution of a contract between an electrical district and one of the private power companies in which the company will serve as the operating agency for the district. Counsel for the district challenged the competence of the Arizona Power Authority to exercise any control over these contractual relations. Since public utilities districts are exempt from the utility regulations of the Arizona Corporation Commission there is a legal question:

If private utility companies can, by contract with such districts, become in recognized legal contemplation, agents of the regulation-exempt districts, then conceivably the companies might be entirely exempt from any state regulations in their sale of district power within these areas.²³

State administration of land resources reflects much the same order of activities and policies as are found in the administration of water resources. Under the American constitutional system title and control over lands in the public domain has been clearly recognized as vesting in the federal government.

Through continued reliance upon homestead policies that were never modified adequately to meet the conditions of the West, lands controlling water-holes and streams were homesteaded and conveyed to private ownership, but large portions of the public domain, approximately 150,000,000 acres in area, remained in federal control for want of takers. As a part of federal policy for the conservation of timber and the protection of watersheds and recreational resources of the West, many of the mountainous areas were reserved as national forests, national parks, or national monuments. In total, the federal government owns approximately fifty-four per cent of the land in the eleven western states, which includes eighty-five per cent of the land in Nevada, seventy-one per cent in Utah and sixty-nine per cent in Arizona.

As a part of federal land policy the states were granted substantial areas of public land for the support of public education and other public activities. These state lands have generally been administered as ordinary real estate transactions between private parties without regard to sound land-use and conservation practices. Some of the states admitted to the Union prior to the 1890's squandered this realty by conveying it to private ownership as a means of stimulating local economic development or as political spoils. As a result some states have relatively small quantities of land remaining in state ownership and control.

Other states, such as Montana and Wyoming, have administered their public lands as important potential sources of wealth for the support of public education. With the discovery of oil these state lands are returning substantial sums for the public schools. In Montana, for example, a single transaction recently brought $3,317,428 to school funds for the lease of 260,000 acres of state land for oil development.²⁴ Montana educators anticipate the time when revenues from school land and the permanent school fund may meet the costs of the state-supported Foundation Program in the public schools.

Even the states that continue to retain large tracts of state land give little attention to the control of land utilization. In his study of public land administration in New Mexico, Holmes concluded that, "Of the three major agencies dealing with land in New Mexico, the state land office gives to those using its land the largest property and imposes the least control."²⁵

The western states never developed public instrumentalities to permit stockmen to take public action to manage and improve the range. Actions necessary for the regulation of grazing upon the open range, including the registration and control of livestock brands, have been organized through stock growers' associations. Following the enactment of the Taylor Grazing Act of 1934, grazing districts were established as the basis for the field organization of federal administration of the unreserved public domain. These grazing districts have come to fill the role of a local-government-type agency for range improvements, with the advisory board exercising certain controls over local policies and over the expenditure of funds allocated for range improvement.

As the mecca of sportsmen, the West has developed state agencies to conserve the fish and game resources of the region. In their dedication to more fish and more game for the sportsman's delight these agencies sought and gained substantial statutory and administrative independence. In many instances, the fish and game commissions have secured control over license fees through earmarked funds free from legislative control over appropriations. Serious questions have been raised as to the consequences of the limited missions served by the sportsman's interests in relation to land resources:

The Utah State Fish and Game Department, . . . very boastfully points with pride to a record 20-year deer increase from 10,000 head in 1920 to 200,000 head in 1940, but on whose land and at what cost to already depleted ranges? And one might well ask by what scientific authority can the director of our State Fish and Game Department declare that the deer population in Utah is "close to the optimum number." Does it seem possible that the mere purchase for reasons of appeasement of private lands seriously damaged by deer will solve the rehabilitation problem of these depleted areas? Does it not seem a bit incongruous that land once purchased by the Game Department passes to the control of the state Land Board?²²

Several western states maintain an extensive system of state parks, which are becoming increasingly popular as recreational centers. In some states, the state parks have been used to preserve the beauty of the primeval vegetation as among the redwoods of California or the beauty of the landscape as in part of the Columbia River Gorge. However, little has been done to develop scenic and recreation resources in private or public control, outside the bounds of state parks, except to advertise their virtues in national magazines.

As timber resources become increasingly scarce, the states have been developing more extensive forestry programs. Today, state forestry departments operate effective fire prevention programs with organized fire-fighting forces to control the menace of fire to standing timber. By-product laboratories have been established to experiment with the economic development of forest by-products to reduce the waste of forest resources. The development of reforestation programs on private timber lands has been stimulated by the exemption of reforestation lands from the general property tax in return for a tax on the value of the timber when harvested. In Oregon, the state forestry board can control the harvesting of reforestation lands through a system of licenses and sets the unit value of the timber to be harvested. However this quid pro quo includes no arrangement for taxing the harvest of virgin timber, or timber on public lands. Little progress has been made in the regulation of logging practices and no efforts have been made to control logging entrepreneurs to assure responsible operations. The word "gyppo" has an established place in the language of western lumbermen, denoting the small operator whose marginal operations tend to determine the nature of competitive practices in the lumber industry.

Since river systems generally exceed the boundaries of a single state and the land is held largely by the federal government, extra-state factors are important in the development of the natural resources of the West. The role of the states in resource administration is in part determined by the way the states relate themselves to these extra-state influences.

As the first effort of the western states to cooperate in the development of a major river system, the experience of the Colorado River Compact was a serious disappointment for those who foresaw a "new principle of a regional problem, regionally administered." Arizona refused to ratify the compact until 1944 and then only on the basis of an interpretation contrary to that accepted by earlier contracting parties. The lack of unanimity among the "sovereign" states has provided the consent necessary for federal action but has destroyed any possibilities of effective cooperation among the states in the development of the Colorado River.

In the Boulder Canyon Project Act, Congress authorized additional arrangements among the states that might have served as a basis for interesting experimentation in regional cooperation by providing consent for the Colorado River basin states to:

... negotiate and enter into compacts or agreements, supplemental to and in conformity with the Colorado River compact and consistent with this Act for a comprehensive plan for the development of the Colorado River and providing for the storage, diversion, and use of the waters of said river. *Any such compact or agreement may provide for the construction of dams, headworks, and other diversion works or structures for flood control, reclamation, improvement of navigation, division of water, or other purposes and/or the construction of power houses or other structures for the purpose of the development of water power and the financing of the same; and for such purposes may authorize the creation of interstate commissions and/or the creation of corporations, authorities, or other instrumentalities.*²⁷

However, no development has been undertaken in pursuance of this authority.

In the Columbia River basin, the states for many years have discussed compact arrangements to allocate the water of the Columbia River, without any success except for a minor compact involving the upper Snake River. Demands for a compact have recently been revived, and Congress in its last session again authorized the Columbia basin states to negotiate an interstate compact.

The principal movers for an interstate compact on the Columbia seem to be concerned with "state rights." The original compact bill contained the proviso that "... electric power generated from waters impounded must be so allocated as to meet existing and potential needs of the upstream states."²⁸ If such a provision had been enacted into law, the domains of the Montana Power Company and the Idaho Power Company would have had priority over the rest of the Pacific Northwest for the consumption of low-cost hydro-electric power.

²⁷ 45 Stat. 1065. Italics added.

²⁸ S. 817 (82nd Cong., 1st sess.).

In opposition to the Bonneville Power Administration policy of providing power anywhere in the Pacific Northwest at a uniform rate, representatives of the basin states are constantly seeking to secure an allocation of power on a state basis. One of the items listed for study in preparation for compact negotiations includes "establishing authority for allocation of power to the states."²⁹ Reservation of power development for Idaho in Hell's Canyon on the Snake River between Idaho and Oregon is one of the principal objectives sought by Idaho's opposition to the proposed Hell's Canyon Dam. According to the governor of Idaho, the Snake River is "our river," and "we're going to fight all the way for our sovereignty."³⁰

The barriers to effective cooperation on an interstate basis are indicated by intervention of the legislature of Idaho to save the Washington Water Power Company from the condemnation proceedings of three Washington public utility districts by prohibiting a public utility district or any public agency of another state from acquiring any property of an electrical utility in the state of Idaho and making it a criminal offense for anyone to negotiate such a transfer of property.³¹ Important generating facilities of the Washington Water Power Company were located in Idaho and substantial severance charges caused by inability to secure the Idaho properties would be an additional impediment to condemnation.

Since so much western real estate is owned by the federal government, tax exemption of federal property is constantly raised as an issue of western resources administration. As a result of pressure from state and local governments, provision has been made for the sharing of income derived from federal lands in lieu of taxes. Federal payments in lieu of taxes are made largely from the sale of timber on national forests and reverted railroad grant lands in Oregon, and from royalties on minerals being extracted from the public domain.

On O and C lands in Oregon, seventy-five per cent of the income from the sale of timber is returnable to the counties in which these lands are located. Only twenty-five per cent is retained for administration by the Bureau of Land Management. In 1952, income from these lands was estimated at one million dollars for Lane County, Oregon, alone.³² Since O and C lands represent alternating sections of scattered parcels, the availability of access roads to facilitate competitive bidding is considered important to the administration of these lands by the Bureau of Land Management. Yet the counties have failed to relate their road construction program to the requirements for O and C lands to such an extent that Congress has authorized the Bureau of Land Management to initiate an access road program to be reimbursed from the county fund.³³ payment in lieu of taxes. By comparison, reforestation land in Oregon is subject to only a 12½ per cent tax on the sale value of the timber at the time of harvest after being exempt from the general property tax during the period of reforestation.

Timber sold from the national forests is subject to a twenty-five per cent

It is possible for the states to tax the wealth that is being extracted from public lands, as well as private lands, since extraction under sale or lease involves the conversion of the property into private ownership. Yet taxes on the extraction of natural resources are largely undeveloped among the western states, in comparison to the states of Louisiana, Oklahoma and Texas. Most taxes on minerals in the western states are nominal charges to defray the costs of inspection programs for mines and oil fields. Forest product taxes, in Oregon for example, are limited to timber harvested on private reforestation lands and a nominal fee to support the forest by-products research program. Western states have never experimented with a tax on the harvesting of grass by a charge upon the animal unit in place of the conventional general property tax upon private lands.

In addition to the loss of revenue potentialities, the reluctance of state governments to tax natural resources has deprived them of the opportunity to exercise fiscal control over the extraction of natural resources, a powerful instrument in the administration of conservation programs. The nominal charges made for inspectional programs generally follow the pattern of ear-marked funds that serve to make the agency a captive of the groups paying the money and prevent effective legislative and executive control in relation to the broader public interest in an inter-related resource program.

Another aspect of federal-state fiscal relations in the resource programs of the western states is the extent of federal aid to state administrative activities and the use of federal funds for public improvements in the West. Through programs in stream pollution abatement, fish and wild life, reforestation and fire control, soil conservation, agricultural extension, and public roads, the federal government makes substantial grants to finance state resource administration. In addition, federal research programs, such as the work done by the U.S. Geological Survey, provide the essential data about western resources which no western state, with the possible exception of California, could provide as a basis for resource planning.

The availability of non-reimbursable federal funds for flood control, navigation, recreation, and fish and wild life is another important influence on state activities in resources administration. Pursuit of this pork-barrel is one of the principal activities of state and local resource agencies. As a result, the Corps of Engineers' concept of project planning has dominated much of the thinking in state resource planning, and state agencies have become thoroughly committed to playing the Engineers' game of "grass roots" politics in an endeavor to establish project feasibility, authorization, and finally appropriation.

Few of the champions of state rights in resources administration are willing to include state responsibility for financing the development and control of natural resources, or even independent research and investigation into resource problems and potentialities.³⁴ Rather, new ways are sought to gain access to federal finance. In the last session of Congress, for example, a bill was introduced authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make non-interest-bearing loans to states for the development of small reclamation projects involving areas of not more than 5,000 acres of irrigable land. Any item in a small project involving "public benefits" might be made non-reimbursable as provided under existing law and the states would be exempt from repayment of these costs.³⁵

As units of government, the states were not conceived in terms that are relevant to resources administration. Only California constitutes an adequate hydrologic unit permitting multiple-purpose administration of an integral watershed area. Major land-use patterns transcend state boundaries and cause the states to determine the nature of their resource programs by a standard of competitive relationships with each other.

The states as constitutional units within the American federal system of government are inclined to conceive of their relationships with one another and, to some extent, with the federal government on the basis of concepts of sovereignty and states' rights which presume inherent authority and power to decide without compulsion to come to agreement in the interest of a transcending public concern. "Interstate action is in the stage of international relations before the League of Nations,"³⁶ except that force is not resorted to when these relations come to an impasse. Yet the major problems of resource administration require regional solutions that transcend state boundaries.

The nature of our federal system necessarily restricts the usefulness of the state governments in providing the institutional arrangements and changes in resource policies that the people of the West require to meet the challenge posed by circumstances of their environment. As Eldon L. Johnson has observed:

It is folly to expect the administrative problems of a particular governmental level to be solved by a concatenation of the powers of many units at a lower governmental level. Just as international problems are not solved by adding together the separate national powers or state problems solved by adding together local powers, so regional problems will not be solved by appeals to the cooperative instincts of the states. The appeal has to be made to the next level of authority, which is the federal government at the present; or if such a level does not exist, it must be created. Tasks requiring day-to-day attention

cannot be handled by conferences, resolutions, voluntary quotas, and treaties and entreaties."³⁷

Despite these limitations, the states, quite as much as water courses and land forms, are realities. However inadequate as basic units, the states have provided political instrumentalities through which westerners have sought to develop and control their natural resources. Through the states the necessary permissive opportunities were provided for individuals or local groups of persons organized as public agencies to undertake resource development. On the other hand, the states have not become important operating agencies in the utilization and development of natural resources when compared with either the federal government or with local government agencies such as the cities of Los Angeles, Seattle, Tacoma or Denver, the East Bay Municipal Utility District, the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California, or numerous irrigation and utility districts.

In most states some resource agencies are doing an effective job on some phases of resources administration, such as the development of state parks, the management of state lands, forest fire prevention and the conservation of wild life; but no state is carrying on a well coordinated multiple-purpose program of resource administration. It is questionable whether the states have either a legislative or administrative arrangement competent to define or to satisfy the public interest in the effective control and utilization of all natural resources. Rather, the states seem best organized to serve the purposes of groups of users relating to a particular resource utilization. Separate resource agencies with their constellation of user groups have multiplied in the state administration of Oregon, for example, until the commercial fishermen have their Fish Commission and the sports fishermen their separate Game Commission. Some resource agencies, through ear-marked funds, are practically removed from legislative control over appropriations. No manner of councils and committees in which each of the constituents retains its particular value orientation and operating assumptions can develop an integrated resource program.

If the western states are to assume a greater role in the conservation and development of natural resources, they must first put their own houses in order. Resource programs need to be developed in terms of a comprehensive review and re-definition of agencies, values, assumptions and policies. There are a few signs on the horizon which indicate that possibly some states, California for example, may lead the way in an effort to redefine the role of the western states in natural resources administration. Otherwise, so far as resource development is concerned, the states are apt to become anachronisms like counties, to be tolerated as they muddle through.

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE AND ADMINISTRATIVE REFORM IN COLOMBIA

LYNTON K. CALDWELL

Syracuse University

A public administrative system is the product of its environment—particularly of its political environment. It is not discrete, but is an aspect of this same environment, affecting and affected by the tendencies of the society of which it is a part. In the rapidly changing present, the complex of social pressures and tensions have created over large areas of the globe an unsettled environment for public service. At a time when effective public administration is more than ever needed to reduce areas of social conflict by achieving generally acceptable solutions to accumulating social problems, the public service in many countries lacks the unity of purpose and technical skill to meet the challenge.

This is notably true where nations, undergoing rapid social transition and attempting uncertainly through democratic government to bring traditional values and practices into line with contemporary needs, must mediate amidst a variety of pressures and counter-pressures. Democratic administration is never easy, even in countries with long histories of democratic government and with well-developed techniques of organization and management. Where the spirit and practice of democratic self-government have not become a living part of the environment and where the political tendencies of the community are contradictory or obscure, the situation of the democratic public official is truly difficult.

Finding no clear direction in which to move, the public administrator sometimes seeks safety in inaction—maneuvering for the security of authority, but evading a responsibility fraught with unpredictable personal consequences. If, rather than risk responsible decision-making, the public administrator bogs down into a state of semi-paralysis or seeks protection through administration by legal rote, he cannot work effectively to reduce instabilities, and his ineffectiveness may further weaken the political order in a cycle of deterioration.

In many parts of the world where there is no well-developed tradition of voluntary community self-help, or few organized means apart from government for the initiation of social or political reform, the public service holds the chief hope for checking the course of social disintegration. To the extent that the administrative system can be developed into a stable, competent and confidence-winning instrument for democratic public action, this achievement will itself influence the environment in a direction favorable to further constructive public effort. For better or for worse, the public service unavoidably will modify its own environment. For this reason public administrators, whatever they may prefer, cannot confine their influence merely to execution of the law. They may reinforce environmental factors resisting change, or their action may—even inadvertently—promote change. But if the public service is to provide leadership in constructive social effort, its administrators must somehow surmount some of the environmental limitations and learn to maximize environmental advantages.

A means increasingly employed toward this end is the enlisting of technical assistance from outside the immediate environment—usually from international organizations or technically advanced nations. The primary task of technical assistance in public administration is to introduce certain catalytic factors into the public service which will strengthen and stimulate innate constructive tendencies. Technical assistance is not in itself administrative reform (which is essentially political in nature); it may indeed be an instrument of administrative reform, but its functions are analytic and advisory rather than policy-deciding.

The acceptance and success of technical assistance depends, therefore, upon the preservation of its proper character. Even though disinterested, assistance toward administrative reform can never be hermetically sealed from political controversy. But to the extent that it becomes diverted into direct administrative reform efforts, it becomes unavoidably involved in the politics of personality, party and administration. Becoming immersed in the cross-currents of the political environment, it hazards its unique purpose: to stimulate and assist the constructive tendencies in the environment through analysis, demonstration and interchange of ideas and experience. This does not preclude the installation of new organizations, procedures or techniques which the assisted government has made up its mind to adopt. Assistance in practical application may be of educative value. And this is perhaps its greatest value; for effective, long-run administration of innovations will depend in large measure on their being understood and accepted throughout the public service.

Because maladministration is often the outgrowth of unfavorable political conditions, public administrative reform is usually a delicate business. It frequently must deal with arrangements and practices that are direct consequences of political ambitions, fears, and controversies. Administrative reform almost inevitably will favor some persons and policies over others. Yet if the reform is to promote enlarged areas of cooperation and to win acceptance for new ideas and methods, the reform measures ought not unnecessarily to intensify resistance to these objectives.

Technical assistance in public administration therefore requires most careful consideration in relation to its effect upon administrative reform. How much and what kind of technical assistance will assist constructive reform efforts cannot be determined without consideration of the environment within which the administrative reforms will be attempted. Thus some insight into the politics of administration in the particular environment is needed to determine what forms of technical assistance may prove useful, and to forecast the probable consequences of their application.

Because all of the possible effects of administrative reform never can be foreseen, the ultimate success of technical assistance in public administration cannot safely be assumed. Accumulating experience—reported and evaluated—should, however, make it possible to avoid the more obvious errors and to widen the margin of predictability. Insofar as this may be true, the following description of the political circumstances affecting public administration in Colombia and of the character and course of recent administrative reform efforts may be instructive.

I. THE POLITICAL ENVIRONMENT

A comparative approach to the study of public administration presupposes certain similarities or parallel situations in the processes of administration wherever they occur. The unsettled political environment of Colombia, whatever its particular or local circumstances, is generically characteristic of many other places in which technical assistance in public administration has been undertaken. Our concern is therefore with those aspects of Colombian government which illustrate the difficulties and problems encountered in administrative technical assistance under comparable conditions in other countries and on other continents. Within the limited scope of a single article one obviously cannot deal adequately with all relevant environmental factors nor give a really comprehensive picture of Colombian government. Emphasis falls logically upon the difficulties of Colombian public administration rather than upon its successes, since it is the difficult areas with which technical assistance is concerned.

For five years Colombians have lived in a state of latent civil war punctuated by sporadic outbursts of violence. The Conservative party, deeply divided against itself, maintains an uneasy hold upon the political machinery of the state. The Liberal party, ostensibly tolerated, has in fact been driven underground and its leaders proscribed—with those of its adherents who remain in public office maintaining a precarious tenure.

Levels of Political Conflict. The issues between the parties are ambiguous. On the surface the conflict appears to be a matter of "ins" versus "outs." But beneath the surface of partisan recrimination are the seldom articulated and often emotional differences among Colombians as to how their hitherto dominant traditions (cultural, religious, economic and political) should be related to the rapidly changing conditions of the contemporary world. The technological and social changes which many Colombians embrace (even while some of them reject the consequences) have not grown out of Colombia's past. In common with much of the rest of the world, the Colombians are confronted with the difficult and dangerous task of reconciling deep-rooted traditionalism with the dynamism of contemporary industrialized democratic society, and with not easily assimilated ideas and methods brought into Colombia from abroad. It is this basically unsettling political situation, rather than the particular issues and personalities in the Colombian political conflict that has long-range significance for public administrative reform. In the several administrative reform efforts described later in this article, particular and local factors frequently had to be taken into account. But it is the general relation of the political environment to reform of the administrative system that has the wider instructive value and therefore deserves the focus of attention.

Architecture of Mistrust. Although Colombia has enjoyed extended periods of political tranquillity, its history and the experience of its neighbors prompted the establishment of a governmental structure designed to make difficult the usurpation of political power. Reversing the maxim divide ut regnes the Colombians have subdivided and balanced their governmental structure so that it cannot readily be made the instrument of an aggressive, purposeful and determined minority. Even under the pressures of the present civil conflict, dictatorship has not been established in Colombia—nor could it be without a far more drastic modification of the constitution than has allegedly occurred since the ninth of April, 1948, when commenced the chain of disorders leading to the unhappy present.

The Colombian constitution, in common with the formalized fundamental law of many other countries, reflects the uncertainties, compromises and contradictions that attended its framing. A document of idealistic social and civil guarantees, the constitution provides, through state of siege, for the suspension of certain of these guarantees when need for them may be greatest. Colombians, mindful of the Gran Colombia of Simon Bolivar, which fell apart to form four separate nations, have established a unitary republic. But administrative convenience, combined with difficulties of communication and strong feelings of local pride, has required the maintenance of regional subdivisions called departments, which enjoy certain semi-autonomous powers specified by the constitution.

Governors of the departments are appointed by the President of the Republic, but each department (there are currently sixteen) has an independent popularly-elected assembly which, however, may be indefinitely prorogued during a national state of siege. The departmental governors are therefore not necessarily popular leaders in their communities (although some are). They appoint the mayors (alcaldes) of the municipalities into which each department is divided, but municipal councils are elective bodies and, except under state of siege, may frustrate an unpopular mayor by removing from his jurisdiction a substantial portion of the local administration.

The constitution of the Republic prescribes for the national government the classical tripartite division of public power—legislative, executive, and judicial—but declares hopefully that although the congress, the government, and the judges have separate functions, they are to collaborate harmoniously in the realization of the ends of the state.

The congress of Colombia consists of two houses, a senate and a chamber of representatives, both popularly elected from districts established on a basis of population. However, since November of 1949 the nation has been governed under a state of siege and the congress has been convened only in extraordinary session. Although the government possesses discretionary power to assemble the congress in regular session, it has not done so, and during the past three years has governed by decree.

The President of the Republic is popularly elected for a term of four years and is ineligible to succeed himself directly. He names the ministers who preside over the principal administrative agencies of the central government and may re-group the various units of the administration and reassign functions under the several ministries without recourse to the congress. But the President does not enjoy the exclusive executive power of the President of the United States—for the executive power of government in Colombia belongs collectively to the President and to the ministers of state.

The heads of the thirteen ministries¹ constitute the Council of Ministers, with which on certain matters the President is required to act in concert, and which under state of siege must approve certain acts of the departmental governors. Except in exercise of his power to nominate and to remove official personnel, no action may be taken by the President with respect to any of the administrative agencies of the national government without the collaboration of the minister concerned. The ministers are required to report to the congress at each general session and thus do not owe an exclusive responsibility to the President.

The authority of both President and ministers is substantially diminished by the placing of many important public functions (presently to be described) in semi-independent agencies outside of the ministerial structure of the government. Some of these agencies are subject to only nominal public administrative control.

Two principal officers of the national government (the controller-general and the attorney-general) are independent of the President. The controller-general is elected by the chamber of representatives for a two-year term and is neither nominated nor removable by the President. The attorney-general, elected by the representatives for a term of four years from a list of three (terna) submitted by the President, heads the Ministerio Publico, which defends the jurisdiction and interests of the nation and prosecutes and enforces the laws governing official conduct.

Court of final appeal on the legality of administrative acts at all levels of government is the Council of State, with subsidiary administrative tribunals in each department. Councillors are selected by congress from terna submitted by the President. Supreme consultative body to the government in matters of administration, its purpose and functions reflect the influence of French administrative law.

II. DESIGN FOR INEFFECTIVENESS

The foregoing paragraphs describe a government contrived primarily to prevent abuse of administrative power—not to secure energetic or coordinated action. The customary machinery and methods, intended to prevent officials from overtly doing harm, frequently prevent them from doing much good, and in any case from doing it very fast. Cumbersome constitutional machinery does not inevitably cause ineffectual administration, as the experience of the United States has demonstrated. But this is largely because in an environment of confidence, the checks and balances are rarely applied in a jealous and literal manner. In an environment in which the spirit of democratic give-and-take has not become natural, technicalities of legal procedure may be observed more in the letter of the document and less in the spirit of the broader objective. This is the situation in Colombia.

The following paragraphs illustrate the manner in which the environment of political instability and mistrust has given rise to administrative arrangements which reduce the government's effectiveness for constructive public service. These are among the defects which technical assistance in administration has found most difficult to remedy and they are recognized by Colombians of all political persuasion as detrimental to effective public service. Actually these impediments to public administrative reform—federalism by expediency, diffused executive power, legalistic accountability, politics of office-holding, and confusion in public enterprise—lie mostly beyond the reach of technical administrative assistance. Each of them represents primarily political rather than technical aspects of administration. But they so directly condition the application of technical reforms that they must be recognized and reckoned with in any effort to improve the existing administrative machinery.

Federalism by Expediency. The theory of unitary national administration has substantially given way in Colombia to a species of ad hoc federalism. There is no consistent pattern of relationship between the nation, the departments and the municipalities. The so-called "national" police, for example, are supported and administered by the departmental governments. Registration and licensing of motor vehicles, originally national functions, were turned over to departmental and municipal administration in 1950. Public education in theory is organized as a single national system with functions divided among the three levels of government; but neither nation, department, nor municipality adheres consistently to its respective functions—and confusion, waste and inequity have resulted. Public health and agricultural programs are separately administered at national and departmental levels, but a measure of coordination is provided for health programs by intergovernmental contracts, and for agriculture by intergovernmental councils. National and departmental public works and highway programs operate independently without benefit of effective coordination.

Although there has been some nationalization of departmental and local functions—for example, railways and certain local secondary schools—the recent trend has been for Bogotá to push responsibilities onto the departments and for the departments in turn to shift their burdens onto the municipalities—this devolution, however, seldom being accompanied by financial assistance. In 1945 the national congress established a comprehensive system of social security for employees of larger private enterprises and for all public agencies. No adequate calculation of the total cost of the system was made, but employee contributions were limited to a low fixed percentage of income, the employer to provide the balance. The departments and municipalities have thus been required to provide benefits which may cost as much as 20% of their annual payrolls. This obligation was irresponsibly mandated by national law, but no assistance (even by allowing additional sources of revenue) was forthcoming from the national government.

Failure to develop a consistent pattern of national, departmental and municipal relations has resulted in confusion and uncertainty in the public administration of Colombia. As departments cannot foresee in which areas national action may next be taken, they are reluctant to initiate programs of their own, or to commit themselves to expenditures for facilities which the nation may presently provide. Concurrent action at all levels of government is most effective if skillfully coordinated; but coordination premises order of some kind—and one could argue that the inconsistencies in Colombian intergovernmental relations have resulted in a confusion that cannot be coordinated.

Political expediency rather than administrative logic or a consistent theory of federalism has shaped the general course of intergovernmental relations. Technical reforms in many areas (notably in public education) are delayed or prevented by the unwillingness or inability of any level of government to assume a role of leadership and initiative. Nevertheless, in specific areas of administration (notably in health and agriculture) the basis for an orderly distribution of responsibilities is being developed. In time a rational compromise between unitary theory and federal practice may emerge.

Executive Power Diffused. Government by junta is a characteristic feature of public affairs in Colombia. There is a pervasive distrust of the individual administrator, and even the President of the Republic is not free to exercise many of his executive powers without the cooperation of the Council of Ministers or of the particular ministers most concerned. Great powers, particularly under state of siege, are vested in the President, the governors, and the mayors; but the practical effect of many of these powers is reduced by the administrative arrangements through which they are exercised.

At no level of government do principal public officers possess the resources of information, personnel and finance to enable them effectively to use the powers at their disposal. Particularly is this true of the departmental governors, who, bereft of budget officers, personnel administrators, competent statisticians and management experts, are in effect "power poor"—unable adequately to fulfill the important role which is theirs by law. Moreover certain programs administered at the departmental level are so tied into national policies and programs (as in education, public health and social security) that there is relatively little a governor can actually do about them.

The mayor might play a more significant part in the administration of local affairs were not many of the municipal services removed from direct municipal supervision and placed under special juntas of which the mayor may not even be a member. Moreover, several important local officials are named by the municipal council, which often places strategic administrative functions under its own appointees independent of control by the mayor. Thus the actual scope for exercise of the powers of mayor is narrowed and no official body exists which can coordinate municipal policies and programs.

A consequence of government by junta and of the many circumstances requiring concurrent action by the President, governors, mayors, and their administrative colleagues, has been a system of multiple management. Its characteristic feature is collective irresponsibility. Most clearly responsible of all public officials is the President of the Republic, who, however, is subject to certain constitutional provisions which restrict his administrative authority especially in relation to the ministers of state—and, potentially at least, subject his administrative acts to reversal by adjudications of the Supreme Court of Justice and the Labor Courts, as well as by the Council of State. In Colombia, as in other countries, party politics sometimes enables the government to bridge the gap between constitutional formalities and administrative objectives. Quite as often, however, political tension and mistrust have accentuated constitutional checks and accelerated the divisive tendencies encouraged by the structure of government. But whatever the case, Colombian officials are provided with abundant opportunity for avoiding responsibility. There are always others to whom they may point in extenuation of their own conduct.

Legalistic Accountability. Encouragement of collective irresponsibility in Colombian government also in part derives from holding public officials accountable not for the effective administration of their programs, but rather for conformance to detailed and often time-consuming legal formalities. Obviously by no means unique to Colombia, accountability for conformance rather than for performance slows the operations of all public agencies, occasions bureaucratic pettifoggery over minor legal provisions, discourages energy and initiative in public office, and encourages time-serving. Methods of accounting and control are cumbersome and complicated, inspired it would seem by deep-seated mutual mistrust and going beyond the ordinary precautions required to prevent misuse of public funds. Sound principles of accountability are thus distorted by excessive legalism and consequently are badly applied in practice.

Relatively simple transactions become unnecessarily involved. Multiple approvals, seals, and signatures are personally required of high-ranking officials for matters which might appropriately be delegated to subordinate levels. Authorization of a single scholarship of 40 pesos per month for secondary school attendance may involve as many as eleven official signatures in duplicate, including those of the departmental director of education, secretary of finance, budget officer, controller-general, and treasurer. Correction of a fiscal error of four cents may require promulgation of an official decree signed personally by the governor and all of his top departmental administrators.

The making of contracts is particularly time-consuming, requiring extensive consultation, multiple signatures, and review. Responsibility for contracts is thereby so widely diffused as frequently to prevent any one officer or agency from being held accountable for performance of the contractual provisions. Where all are responsible each may more easily disclaim responsibility. Purchasing procedures are likewise encumbered by numerous approvals of dubious utility. Purchase vouchers in one Colombian city must be authorized by the mayor, attested by the personero, authenticated by the head of the department making the purchase, approved by the treasurer, and finally must be audited and recorded by a revisor and an accountant.

The waste of time involved in these procedures is not an inevitable concomitant of official accountability. And after attempting to guard against all eventualities of official carelessness or misconduct, the government of Colombia still lacks many of the most useful records and procedures for genuine control—particularly for managerial control. Absence of valid historical series on many statistical matters, incomparability of related statistical and financial records, insufficiency of data to support findings, unevenness in the accuracy of component parts of cumulated public records such as vital statistics, agricultural reporting and school attendance—all these deficiencies in tools of managerial control make difficult any ready appraisal of the Colombian public service.

Means for measuring effective management do not exist within Colombian government. Their absence is not explained by lack of knowledge of their availability but rather by fear of their political consequences. The tools of scientific management might strengthen the coercive potential of the officials who possess them, but they might likewise (as in personnel reform) restrict personal or party manipulation of the public service. The “successful” administrator, therefore, signs innumerable documents, conforms to all the technicalities of the law (usually sufficiently complex to permit some measure of flexibility through adroit maneuvering) and seldom concerns himself with the degree to which the public may benefit from his performance.

Politics of Office-holding. Frustrating legalism induces devious administration; diffused responsibility discourages individual initiative. Both make public service in Colombia a matter of routine office-holding rather than of effective management. Public officials of exceptional energy and insight do attempt to accomplish something, but they are likely to incur distrust to a degree discouraging to all but the most persevering.

There may be as much faithful and disinterested devotion to the public service in Colombia as in many other countries; but public service as an ideal appears to arouse little popular enthusiasm. The concept of public office as a public trust and the sense of dedication to public service have not become ingrained in the national political ideology. Holding high office is traditional among many of the prominent families—but the practice belongs rather to the Latin sense of noblesse oblige than to the Jeffersonian notion of a tour of duty. Tenure of public office is brief at all levels of responsibility and officials are not inclined to undertake long-range reforms of benefit primarily to their successors and of inconvenience and disagreeable difficulty to themselves.

Merit system and career service ideas are generally conceded by Colombians to be impractical in the present national state of development, and nearly all appointive positions are frankly filled by patronage. Changes in top officialdom even within the same party are likely to be followed by a sweep through the ranks. Moreover, in comparison with private opportunities, the financial rewards lawfully pertaining to public office are not great; filling the more responsible positions with suitable incumbents is not easy. In Caldas—one of the most prosperous and best governed departments—the number of mayors in its forty-five municipalities has averaged 2.6 per year since 1949, with some municipalities having as many as four, five, and six mayors per annum. Inexperienced and untrained personnel are consequently too numerous for the efficient operation of the public services. Top officials, unacquainted with their own offices and duties, and only vaguely aware of their relation to the total structure of government, cannot direct the work of their subordinates more effectively than the blind can lead the blind.

Among the practical consequences of uncertain and ineffectual management is easy-going indifference among the rank and file employees. In many public offices there is evidence either of too many employees and too little work, or of inadequate planning and direction. Conspicuous numbers of employees do not appear to be engaged at useful tasks with sufficient regularity to justify the present organization of their duties. Their days are passed in intra-office visiting, reading newspapers, drinking coffee, and looking out of the windows. Criticism of this state of affairs is not wanting within as well as without the public service, but effective corrective measures have been slow to win acceptance because they entail changes in points of view and practices (such as adoption of civil service reform) for which most Colombians appear to be unprepared.

Confusion in Public Enterprise. Well-defined distinctions between public functions and private interests do not exist in Colombia. The relation of government to economic enterprise is, for example, determined more by convenience and expediency than by theory or logic. Influences of laissez-faire capitalism and trade union socialism have been insignificant in shaping the economic role of government. The most consistent practice in the organization of public services of an economic character is to place their control in agencies not directly amenable to political pressure.

Because personal or partisan patronage rather than technical competence has been the primary criterion for appointment to public office, the public service generally does not enjoy a high degree of popular confidence. Popular distrust of "political" administration has led to the establishment of a large number of semi-public agencies outside of the ministerial structure of the government. Some of these are virtually private organizations which have secured official status and support and to which important public administrative functions have been delegated.

At the national level there are at least nineteen of these semi-autonomous privately managed public enterprises—more if one counts their affiliates. With a few exceptions, such as the National University, they may be divided into three groups: (1) financial, (2) developmental, and (3) agricultural. Although certain of these organizations are administered under single managers, most of them are directed by boards or juntas which undertake to decide detailed questions of policy and management.

Chief among the financial agencies is the powerful Banco de la Republica, which is in many respects the central fiscal and monetary agent of the government, and which holds, among numerous auxiliary enterprises, concessions to operate the state-owned salt and emerald mines. Other semi-autonomous fiscal enterprises include the Farm Loan Bank, Exchange Control, Stabilization Fund, Central Mortgage Bank, and the Instituto de Credito Territorial, which is the chief national public housing agency.

Developmental enterprises at the national level include the Industrial Development Institute, the Institute of Water Resources and Power Development, the national hydroelectric plants, the Paz de Rio Steel Company and the National Navigation Company.

Among the agricultural agencies, by far the most important is the National Coffee Federation, which is the principal organization concerned with coffee economics and production, the national and departmental agricultural agencies having almost nothing to do with the chief national agricultural product. The federation is financed primarily by a national tax on coffee shipments, the proceeds of which are turned over to the federation-controlled Fondo Nacional del Cafe. Other semi-public agencies established and controlled by agricultural producer groups are the National Cotton Institute, the Cattle-raisers Association, and tax-supported funds for the protection or development of tobacco, wool, cocoa, and wheat. Closely related to agricultural production and entirely apart from the Ministry of Agriculture is the National Institute of Supplies, concerned with price support for agricultural products and the importation of foods, and the Instituto de Parcelaciones, Colonizacion y Defensa Forestal which controls colonization of public lands, provides credits and supplies to settlers, and is now beginning work in forestry and reforestation.

There are at least seventeen additional agencies which perform functions germane to certain of the regular national ministries, but which for various reasons (again chiefly distrust of political administration) have been placed outside of the ministerial structure of the government. Seven of these are public-employee retirement systems. Others include such important enterprises as the National Railways Administrative Board and the National Telecommunications Company.

The officialization of privately controlled enterprise at the national level has been paralleled by the privatization of certain public services at the municipal level—a consequence of the invincible tendency of government in Colombia to surmount all difficulties by the easy expedient of borrowing money. The banks and other lenders have been understandably reluctant to rely upon the good intentions of a transitory officialdom to redeem the public debts when due. To protect their loans the banks have required municipalities to pledge for debt redemption the revenues of certain self-supporting public services. To ensure that these revenues will be available when due, the banks have further insisted that the revenue-yielding municipal enterprises be separated from direct municipal control and be reorganized under special boards (juntas de las empresas delegadas) consisting of three members, two of whom are in effect representatives of the lending agencies.

Characteristically these empresas delegadas include water-works, sewers, refuse disposal, street lighting, public markets, slaughterhouses, and sometimes municipal telephone companies. Servicing of the debt is a first charge on revenues; thereafter the junta at its discretion may provide for operation, maintenance, improvement or expansion of the services—and the funds remaining may then be turned over to the municipality. Actually, in spite of what appears to be an unfavorable arrangement, the Colombian municipalities derive substantial revenues from the empresas, which under professional management and with stability of employment usually provide better service and more revenue than comparable enterprises under direct municipal administration.

In spite of this segregation of delegated enterprises there is commonly widespread confusion between the fiscal operations of revenue-yielding services and of municipal services generally. As a matter of both official and public convenience the delegated enterprises have sometimes been designated as official agencies for the collection of the municipal real estate, street lighting, and industrial and commercial taxes. In principle this suggests tax farming, as the agent must be allowed something to cover the cost of collection. But the terms of collection are subject to at least periodic public control by means of contract, and the public has greater confidence in the impartial application of the tax laws than it would have under "political" administration.

The foregoing characteristics of Colombian government (and others which might be added) almost ensure the ineffectuality of public administration. There are, of course, public programs such as the national system of real estate evaluation which in spite of environmental handicaps apparently provide a high quality of public service. But in general the conventional administrative attitudes—exacerbated by current political disorders—have laid a profound malaise upon the public service. These are conditions which must be changed if the Colombian public service is to become a more effective instrument of the public welfare. Each of the five characteristics of Colombian public administration which have just been described have grown out of a political environment which technical assistance cannot alter directly or at once. Yet these are the kinds of conditions which will prevent or frustrate administrative reform efforts. They afford a most stubborn challenge to technical assistance in public administration, and in the Colombian experience to date are areas in which administrative reform has moved most slowly.

III. INTERNATIONAL BANK AND PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION MISSIONS

Administrative conventions institutionalized in the structure and procedures of government persist with great tenacity in Colombia as elsewhere. But not all Colombians view their administrative difficulties as trials to be forever endured. In the past, Colombians who have considered public questions from other than positions of personal self-interest, have inclined toward theoretical and juristic analysis. During the past three years, however, interest in a critical and concrete approach to problems of public administration has developed. Since 1949 at least four major economic and administrative studies have been sponsored by Colombian governments with technical direction or assistance from abroad.²

The first of these studies was undertaken by an economic mission organized in 1949 by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development at the invitation of the Colombian government. The purpose of the Bank mission was to recommend "a comprehensive integrated development program for Colombia."³ Although its concern lay primarily with economic matters, the International Bank could not disregard the relevant influences of the public services and public finance. Commenting on the organization of the government for planning and administration, the mission observed "that the Government at its various levels is not now well adapted either for comprehensive economic planning or for the efficient implementation of such planning."⁴ The limited effectiveness of previous foreign technical missions to Colombia was in part attributed to these deficiencies. "A continuation of this situation," the Bank report declared, "raises serious questions as to the extent to which Colombia might effectively take advantage of the international technical assistance program."⁵

Following the report of the International Bank Mission, the Colombian government sponsored two supplementary studies. One of these was undertaken by the Committee for Economic Development, a group of six prominent Colombians appointed by the President of the Republic for the purpose of reviewing the report and recommendations of the Bank mission. Although the committee, on the basis of further studies and changed conditions, revised some of the details contained in the Bank report, it adopted the recommended program and endorsed the majority of its specific proposals. The findings of the committee were submitted to the government through a series of reports to the various ministries concerned and the final comprehensive report was printed by the Banco de la Republica.⁶

The second and more extensive follow-up on the Bank report was the Public Administration Mission headed by the former chief of the International Bank Mission, who also acted as consultant to the Committee on Economic Development—thus providing coordination for all three efforts. Work of the Public Administration Mission extended from June, 1950 to March, 1951 and was conducted concurrently with the studies of the Committee on Economic Development, to which it was in large measure complementary. The task of the Public Administration Mission was to study the administrative organization and procedures of the Colombian government and to recommend to the ² This development is not entirely novel. As early as 1923 the Colombian government adopted certain financial and monetary measures recommended by a mission from the United States headed by Professor Edwin W. Kemmerer of Princeton University.

President proposals for its improvement, particularly improvements required for the success of the basic economic program. The Bank report had pointed out certain areas in which more efficient production and utilization of resources were contingent upon improvements in the organization, personnel and procedures of the government. Attention of the Public Administration Mission was concentrated on these areas. The studies and final report of the mission dealt largely with the overall organization and central top-level management of the principal ministries and agencies of the government concerned with internal economic affairs.⁷

The fourth study followed from the first three, but did not relate directly to the work of the International Bank Mission. In 1952 the Governor of Caldas sponsored an economic and public administrative study of the third most populous department of Colombia. A small technical staff of Americans and Colombians undertook the basic survey work in the capital city of Manizales, with extensive field observation throughout the department.⁸

As in the national public administration study, attention in the Caldas report was directed first to the economic and social needs of the department, and second to the organizational, financial and procedural changes in the government which were necessary to enable public administrators better to meet these economic and social needs. The Caldas mission, with the background of the earlier studies, in many ways came closest to the immediate needs and problems of Colombia. It required extensive and first-hand acquaintance with local budgets and office-holders, with local institutions and with popular hopes, prejudices, and inclinations. Only through this detailed analysis considered in relation to comprehensive long-range objectives was the mission able to develop recommendations that would answer current needs and provide a basis for future administrative reforms.

IV. PROSPECTS FOR ADMINISTRATIVE REFORM

Administrative practices in common with all human institutions are products of the mind—and minds must be changed if administrative reforms are to be accomplished. Thus, although the economic and administrative studies in Colombia have been perforce concerned with material, structural, and legal problems, the real source of Colombia's difficulties is in the habits of mind associated with the cultural environment. The traditional patterns of social behavior dominant in Colombia have given rise to political and administrative practices that under changing conditions of the present are often inconsistent with effective government. The bitter political struggle between the Conservative and Liberal parties is destroying old relationships without providing a new orientation for the nation's public service.

Public administration in Colombia operates today in an environment of political instability. Although there is widespread genuine desire for administrative reform, there is also general skepticism about the survival of reform following a change in government—even under the same political party. But if the present partisan disorders could be terminated, Colombia would still face the difficult and painful adjustment of long-established methods of government and administration to new circumstances and new demands—a process of transition that has become the characteristic condition of government over most of the world.

The course of this adjustment in any given country depends in some measure upon the strength and adaptability of its public administrative system. And the ultimate effectiveness of efforts toward improvement of that system will depend in large measure upon early practical accomplishments that will advance the achievement of long-term reforms. In appraising the accomplishments of technical assistance for public administration in Colombia, distinction should be drawn, therefore, between immediate results and long-range consequences.

The interrelatedness of governmental processes often makes one reform contingent upon another, and a sequence of administrative changes inevitably encounters an area of administration which for political reasons cannot be touched. Such measures as are at first adopted therefore tend to be isolated or fragmentary. The recommendations of the economic and public administration missions which were most readily accepted related closely to pressing economic needs and were tied into specific action programs: notably in transportation, exchange control, and agriculture. Administrative reforms in these areas gained political acceptance as they could be shown to enhance the prosperity and well-being of the Republic.

Recommendations for reform of administrative organization and of personnel, accounting and management procedures have been less enthusiastically received, although the need for reform is widely admitted. But even when reforms in these areas have won approval in principle, desire for improvement does not easily overcome doubt regarding the wisdom of attempting to put them into practice. Unlike the measures clearly necessary to economic development, there is no present compelling pressure for their adoption.

That which may be accomplished very soon is not always readily distinguishable from that which requires the assistance of time. Foreign experts themselves need time to acquire a sense of the receptivity of a people toward change. Although both the earlier and more recent economic and public administration reports in Colombia propose broadly comprehensive programs, there is a perceptible difference of emphasis in the national public administration survey and the program subsequently recommended for Caldas. Both reports considered the long-range future. The national report recommended in considerable detail reforms which in retrospect appear to be realizable only at some future date when environmental factors are more propitious. The Caldas report tended to emphasize reforms of more immediate probability, but its recommendations took into account the effects of short-term progress on long-term objectives.

Thus the Caldas report, unlike the national public administration report, did not make comprehensive recommendations for non-partisan reform of the public personnel system. Clearly, improved personnel practices are needed both in the national and departmental governments; but present political circumstances preclude any early adoption of merit-system principles. Accordingly the Caldas report, after urging consideration for the ultimate establishment of a permanent non-partisan system of public employment, concentrated upon specific improvements of personnel organization and procedures under existing conditions. But the measures proposed (a central personnel office; establishment of job descriptions and minimum qualifications for positions; employee training) could be put into effect at the present time and would provide a foundation upon which a workable non-partisan career service might in time be based.

If it is asked what may be learned from the Colombian administrative reform efforts, no simple answer can suffice. Insight into the processes of technical assistance in public administration is more likely to be gained from the comparative study of numbers of experiences reported from different places (under both similar and contrasting circumstances) than from an account limited to a specific country. The Colombian experience briefly described in this article has been used to illustrate some of the difficulties and problems of technical assistance in public administration under unsettled political conditions. Although certain conclusions have been drawn upon the basis of Colombian experience as it appears to the author, the article has proceeded upon the level of illustration rather than of generalization.

What may be learned from Colombian experience depends in part upon what may be learned from administrative reform efforts under comparable circumstances elsewhere. Thus the value of a particular experience is not necessarily to be found solely in the experience itself, but rather in relation to other events which taken together afford a basis for valid generalization. Implicit in the comparative approach to the study of administration is the accumulation of descriptive data which in time may afford a basis for generalization.

What has technical assistance in Colombia accomplished in overcoming the impediments which political conditions have placed in the way of administrative reform? This paper has dealt with five "political" aspects of Colombian administration which obstructed administrative reform efforts, and their disadvantage to the Colombian public service was pointed out in the economic and public administration reports. But it is questionable whether the proper role of technical assistance is the launching of a headlong attack upon them within the public service; nor are these conditions of a character which may be exorcised by official command. They can be removed only as they can be replaced by institutions and practices more consonant with effective administration. Specific recommendations of the missions which might be realized promptly through administrative action did, however, get at some of the roots of maladministration. Realistic accounting procedures, reliable statistical methods, improved personnel machinery—each can contribute indirectly toward at least a partial modification of the political environment of the public service.

Essential to an evaluation of the Colombian experience with administrative reform is the factor of time. One cannot with finality assess contemporaneous efforts to reform a public service system. One must see how the efforts work out in practice. But neither can one safely wait until an indefinite future to begin the appraisal of these efforts, for some may take effect at once, others at differing rates over an extended period of years. The proper question would therefore seem not to be: What can one learn from administrative reform efforts in (for example) Colombia? One may better ask: How much may we fail to learn in the future if we do not now secure adequate data regarding the course of many different attempts at technical assistance in public administration?

Adequate data includes more than mission reports. It requires study of the circumstances leading to the enlistment of outside aid, and it requires follow-up studies on the ultimate results of technical assistance efforts. The problem of implementation of the technical assistance report becomes relevant from the very inception of the intention to seek outside aid. Decisions taken at the beginning of a technical assistance project may fundamentally affect the final outcome of the effort.⁹ Thus the comparative study of technical assistance requires a comprehensive approach which takes into consideration all relevant ecological factors; and this approach demands not only depth in detail, but also breadth in time.

In Colombia time will be needed for the more comprehensive recommendations of the economic and public administration missions to win substantial acceptance. But in this respect Colombia, even if relieved of her internal political difficulties, would hardly be unique. In the United States basic reforms in budgeting, departmental organization, accounting and personnel practices were proposed years—even decades—in advance of their adoption. These reforms in the idea stage, like leaven, slowly worked changes in the political environment. Assisted by collateral developments, they prepared a public opinion favorable to their ultimate adoption. Given the unsettled political conditions in Colombia, the results of the economic and public administration missions have already been considerable. The larger plans for the reform of public administrative organization and procedure remain yet to be fulfilled; tokens of hopes that may one day be realized as Colombia achieves a political environment more favorable to public service.

⁹ The inter-related character of the several aspects of technical assistance was discussed by Roscoe C. Martin, "Technical Assistance: The Problem of Implementation," Public Administration Review, Vol. 12; pp. 258-66 (Autumn, 1952).

THE ROLE OF THE MILITARY IN MIDDLE EAST POLITICS

During the past four years several Middle Eastern countries have experienced governmental changes in which the army took an active part. In Syria and Egypt the army deliberately intervened to overthrow discredited regimes and to depose the heads of state. In Lebanon and Iraq the heads of state, themselves alarmed by an intense struggle among rival political parties, invited the army to intervene in order to maintain order. In Lebanon the army refused to crush the opposition, acting only as a caretaker; in Iraq the army agreed to support authority against disorder and the effect of its intervention cannot yet be foreseen.

This control of government by the military is indicative both of serious defects in democratic processes in the Middle East and of the eagerness with which Middle Eastern leaders seek high political office. In Western democratic countries, traditions have developed which tend to keep the army isolated from domestic politics, although military advice has often been sought on foreign policy, and persons whose careers have been in the military service are not infrequently elected, or appointed, to high political positions. This is a quite different matter, however, from the military's choosing to occupy high political office through the weapons of its own profession.

There is an almost nostalgic longing in the Middle East, common to all political groups, for a "strong" regime which will tolerate neither multiplicity of political parties nor anarchy of ideas. This is due in part to the failure of democracy to provide agreement on fundamentals. Beyond this, however, the forces set in motion since the First World War have artificially speeded up the process of Westernization beyond the ability of the people to adapt the imported ideas to their social needs. Such abstract concepts as sovereignty, self-determination, and democracy were thrust upon the people of the Middle East without their having been prepared for them. If the Western powers, in taking an active part in the re-organization of the Middle East after World War I, had known the Eastern countries better and had had a greater appreciation of the historical process that had been going on, the Eastern peoples might have been given an opportunity to adapt Western political concepts and institutions more slowly and would probably have developed their own form or forms of democracy to fit their own needs and aspirations. It did not help that the Middle Eastern leaders who cooperated with the Western powers never tried to reconcile Western concepts and institutions with existing institutions so as to avoid conflict with religious and conservative groups. As a result, democracy from its very inception failed to command general respect, and when adequate reforms were not achieved democracy had to bear the blame. Opposition to democracy came from the right (religious) as well as from the left (socialist and communist) parties and groupings; and when neither side could muster sufficient support to achieve power, the army intervened to carry out a moderate program of reform by force.

For centuries Islam provided for the believers a way of life, the validity and perfection of which no pious Muslim ever questioned. As a divine system, Islam set up the principle that authority belongs to God; but the caliph, though enthroned by the people to enforce God's law, was not constitutionally responsible to the electorate. However, the caliph and his subjects were both bound by the divine law, the violation of which would make them equally liable for punishment. Such a theory of the state, placing ultimate responsibility in God, is not inherently democratic. However, since Islam is regarded as the embodiment of God's will and justice, its believers derive satisfaction from the moral conviction that their political system, though authoritarian in nature, could not possibly be matched by any other system. Further, Islam is regarded as immune from foreign encroachment or attack, for, as the power of Islam is God's power, no other community could successfully launch an attack on it: failure would certainly be on the side of the infidels, since success could not be divorced from Islam.¹

The pious Muslim, witnessing the change of Islam under the impact of Western ideas and institutions, is undergoing a moral crisis. Not only is he shocked that Islam should be divorced from the caliphate and the divine law replaced by secular legislation, but also that the West should be encroaching upon Islam with impunity. The challenge of Westernization has been responded to differently by the various shades of opinion. The agnostic new generation, attracted by the positivistic philosophy of the West, advocated a complete break with the past and the adoption of Western secular institutions. Following the First World War, when democracy had become fashionable, the new generation accepted democracy without trying to adapt it to existing conditions. The learned doctors of the divine law, supported by the older generation, objected to the introduction of Western institutions because of their incompatibility with Islamic institutions. Apart from the slogan "go back to Islam," however, they had little to offer in the way of a constructive program of reform which might have combined the best of Islam and Western institutions. Thus the conflict that ensued was between two extreme schools; the new denounced the old as incompatible with modern life, and the old, witnessing a sudden break with the past, emptied the vials of its wrath upon those in authority for permitting this change.

Nor was the experiment of the new generation with democracy a happy one.

For no sooner had democracy begun to operate, with its complicated procedural problems of electioneering and parliamentary debates (to say nothing of the endless quarrels that developed among rival parties and politicians), than the people began to learn how scandalously its processes could be misused by unscrupulous leaders. To the old school, democracy failed to command the respect or allegiance of the people in the same way as God's law had done in the past. The activist character of democratic politics appeared too vulgar and too worldly in the eyes of pious Muslims who have habitually revered the awe-inspiring traditional institutions. Further, democracy as practiced in the West seemed to emphasize liberty, not equality. But to peoples who for centuries have been accustomed to authoritarian regimes, liberty could not possibly be as much appreciated as equality, since it permitted the enrichment of the few at the expense of exploited masses. What rendered the situation more difficult was, of course, the absence of any significant middle class with interests intermediate to those of the few rich or of the many poor. Such a middle class would have championed democracy against autocracy and feudalism as did the middle classes of Western Europe. But a sudden rise of the middle class is hardly to be looked for in predominantly agricultural countries where feudalism has persisted for a long time. In such countries the freedom permitted under democracy only rendered competition more acute, and the desperate masses, bent on improving their economic condition, were bound to fall under the influence of radical ideas. The people of the Middle East, not unnaturally, judged democracy by the results achieved rather than by its theoretical soundness. The judgment to which they have come is that they have been deceived by those in authority and that democracy has failed them.

During the latter part of the nineteenth century, a good start in Islamic reforms was made by a number of enlightened teachers such as Jamal al-Din al-Afghani and Muhammad Abduh, who saw no harm to Islam if the believers borrowed Western ideas and concepts. Muhammad Abduh offered a formula of reform which advocated the "modernization," not the "secularization," of Islam. Although he was opposed at the outset by the Azhar University of Cairo, Abduh's approach gradually gained the support of Muslim opinion, and the Azhar graduates were eventually dominated by the Abduh school.² After the introduction of democracy, however, the Azhar, without carrying the constructive reforms of Abduh forward, supported the existing regime and hence could no longer attract liberal Muslims; these consequently preferred to go to the Westernized schools and thus lost touch with Islamic learning. As a result, there is no moderate Muslim reformer such as Abduh who can offer a reform program combining the best of Islam and Western civilization.

This situation gave an opening to lay religious leaders, who revived the traditional religious zeal combined with intense nationalism. The Muslim Brotherhood (al-Ikhwān al-Muslimūn) may be cited as probably the best expression of this lay religious revival. Contemporary critics still differ on the significance of the Brotherhood's contribution to the modernization of Islam. While it is true that Western technological inventions have been readily accepted, the Brotherhood could hardly be credited with having improved on Abduh's contribution in the realm of non-material values. One could even discern in the Brotherhood a falling away from Abduh's religious toleration by arousing religious fanaticism mixed with nationalism. Moreover, since the Brotherhood derived popular support by its opposition to the existing regime, it was critical of democracy. Lacking the constructive approach of Abduh, it was unwilling to attempt the reconciliation of democracy with Islam, and instead advocated the re-establishment of theocracy. Shaykh Hasan al-Banna, leader of the Brotherhood, came very near to achieving power during the Palestine war, but he came out into the open too soon and clashed with the ruling oligarchy. He was criticized for having resorted to violence and terrorism and the government used this as an excuse (after he was treacherously assassinated) to close the headquarters of his organization. The Egyptian government could not completely suppress the movement, which has been permitted to resume its activities, but the movement suffered seriously from the blunders committed by its leaders.³

Even if the Brotherhood had achieved power (with the consequence that similar moves might have been attempted in Syria and Iraq), it is unlikely that its members would have enjoyed a long term of office. The Brotherhood's program was too Calvinistic in spirit to be tolerated for any length of time. The re-establishment of a theocracy, regarding all other states as inferior, would have been incompatible with the new international order. Furthermore, the theocratic emphasis on the solidarity of the faith and the strict enforcement of the divine law, an emphasis which disregarded the medieval methods by which these objectives might be achieved, would have been strenuously opposed. The Brotherhood and other religious movements overlooked the fact that in a modern society, under the impact of a world-wide trend to regard religion as a matter of individual conscience, no such solidarity is achievable.⁴

It has become a popular slogan, repeated again and again by Muslim as well as Western publicists, that the one power which is equipped to serve as a barrier to communism in the Middle East is Islam. On purely doctrinal grounds Islam, probably more than any other religion, is hard to reconcile with communism. As a system which evaluates all values of life in terms of a divine juridico-theological code, it is opposed to dialectical materialism and, of course, to atheism. To the pious Muslim performing the daily prayer and conforming strictly to the rules of the divine law, communism appears to reduce life to a mere mechanical process, stressing earthly rather than spiritual values. Further, Islam recognizes the institution of private property and free enterprise, and the divine law regulates all kinds of possession and disposal of property, including its transmission to the owner's children and the near kin by inheritance. Even the rights of the state to own or to dispose of property are limited by the divine law during both war and peace.⁵

Yet there are a few Muslim thinkers, witnessing the present plight of the poor and the exploitation of the landlords, who argue that Islam is equally opposed to the great disparity between rich and poor. They cite traditions to the effect that the Prophet Muhammad often expressed his aversion to poverty. From early Islam the doctors of law and theology often have advised the caliphs to pay proper attention to the poor, since the law required the distribution of alms among them. Modern Muslim thinkers, regarding Islam as an ideal system of social justice, argue that Islam is inherently opposed to exploitation and poverty and that it is the duty of the community to regulate its economic life on an equitable basis. "Social justice," said one of them, "is like the jihād [holy war], a collective duty upon all Muslims," i.e., its enforcement is required by the law; if it is not fulfilled, all the Muslim community, including those in authority, fall in error and become liable for punishment.⁶ But these moderate Muslim thinkers had little influence on the ruling oligarchy or the Azhar, who seemed to be satisfied that the oft-quoted sacred citations, and the sermons given in the Friday prayers in support of property rights and capitalism, would provide moral strength against poverty and unemployment.

Such attitudes quickly gave an opening to the rise of militant leftist groups who either argued that Islam could be reconciled with socialism or tried to turn their faces completely against Islam in favor of communism. The moderately leftist groups maintain that Islam is not opposed to socialism, arguing that the early Islamic creed, divorced from later accretions, was in accord with socialist ideas. Their socialism is based on the Islamic principle of equality, which recognizes no differences in society on the basis of wealth. No social or economic distinctions, they maintain, were imposed by God upon the believers; although, as revealed in the Qur'an, He "created you of male and female, and made you races and tribes," He recognized no differences among them save on the basis of "piety" and "Godfearing."⁷ The socialists cited as evidence for their argument the case of a companion of the Prophet Muhammad, Abu-Dhar al-Ghifari (whom they regard as the first Muslim socialist), who criticized the caliph for his departure from Muhammad's puritanical life by acquiring wealth and ignoring the interests of the masses.

Communists, deriving their ideas from the teachings of Marx and Lenin, repudiate almost all national and religious institutions as the bulwark of the reactionary classes. The Middle East extremists, who argue with Marx that religion is the opium of the people, attack Islam and its teaching with an anti-religious religiosity. Their program, advocating a complete reorganization of society based on the doctrine of world communism, is probably the most constructive (as well as destructive in its sweeping denunciation of existing conditions) so far offered by any Middle East group in opposition to the ruling class. Its appeal to the masses and malcontents, who have not grasped the most elementary principles of communism, is due to the persuasive ability of the local leaders, who present communism as the panacea for all social ills. The discipline and solidarity displayed by the communists (though they often quarrel on procedural matters) and their tenacity in fighting repression have rendered their work effective and enhanced their prestige among the masses. However, despite their outcry against exploitation, graft, and corruption, they still have a long way to go before they can claim active support from all the masses. Except perhaps for those who are regular members of secret communist parties (all Middle East countries have either refused to permit, or have suppressed, communist organizations), most of their followers may be classed as sympathizers who probably have certain mental reservations about the doctrine. Communism's opposition to religion and its disdain for other mores, to say nothing of its affiliation with a foreign power, are but a few of the factors which still make many hesitate to accept in toto the communist creed. If, however, these sympathizers were forced to choose between the existing regimes and communism, it is not unlikely that their choice would fall on communism.

The failure of any of these platforms to gain full support from the masses, as well as the vulnerability of the democratic regimes, made the people look elsewhere for leadership—toward the army.

III

The interest of the Middle Eastern countries in building up strong armed forces probably goes back to antiquity when the power of the monarch was dependent on two pillars—the clergy and the army. The king, in addition to proclaiming himself god or the son of a god, was the army chief and often took the field as the actual commander of the army. This tradition of the close association of rulers with the army persisted down through the centuries under Arab and Ottoman rule. So closely connected were the army chiefs with the caliphs and sultans that often the viziers and grand viziers were chosen from among the army officers who served in the royal courts. Not infrequently they established matrimonial relationships with the reigning dynasties. The Arab and Ottoman armies, at times when the army chiefs had become more powerful than their masters, often deposed one ruler after another at their pleasure. Just as the Praetorian guard dethroned one Emperor after another, so the Arab legion and Ottoman Janissary put to death one sovereign after another, replacing them by their own nominees. The struggle between army officers and sovereigns degenerated to the throat-cutting level, so that either the army or the dynasty had to be liquidated. When society was subjected to this kind of internal struggle, the very foundation of its political organization reached a breaking point and a radical change in the regime became inevitable. This significant feature in the history of Eastern societies, which often recurred (it is not suggested that it is inherently cyclic in nature), indicates that recent events in the modern Middle East should not be surprising.

In the modern Middle East, following the old established military tradition, keen interest has been shown in organizing well-disciplined national armies along European lines. Even such new countries as Iraq and Syria, when they were under a Mandate and there was no real need for armed forces, aspired to organize small national armies for future enlargement. When both Iraq and Syria had attained independence, special care was given to reorganize and enlarge the national forces, which were deemed necessary to act as guardians of the newly won independence. In countries which had an earlier independent status, the army figured even more largely in national life; in the case of Turkey and Iran, the Kemalist and Pahlevi regimes owed probably as much to the army in their establishment as to the strength of character and the statesmanship of their founders. In Egypt, from the time of Muhammad Ali, founder of the ruling dynasty, the army proved to be the chief personal preoccupation of the viceroys, who spent on it lavishly for the consolidation of their power. From the British occupation (1882), however, to the declaration of independence (1922) the army was reduced almost to a police force. But the interest in reorganizing a national army was revived, especially after the signing of the Anglo-Egyptian Treaty of 1936, not only to repel foreign aggression, but also in order that the army should become the symbol of the new national life.

Most of the Middle East army officers are drawn from the middle class or the ruling oligarchy: very few have come from the poorer classes. The soldiers, as a rule, are drawn from the peasant and working classes, and most of them have been recruited on the basis of national conscription. The majority of the soldiers are illiterate, but many of them who have remained in the service long enough have received elementary education in addition to military training. It is the officers, rather than the soldiers, who have been instrumental in involving the army in politics. Elementary and high school education carries with it indoctrination with a spirit of intense nationalism. Moved by patriotism as well as by personal ambition, many high school graduates enter the law colleges or military academies with the idea that a career in law or military service is a stepping-stone to high government position. Not infrequently high school teachers and lawyers, dissatisfied with their professions or believing their ambitions can better be attained in the army, enter military schools and resume their public careers in the military service. General Najib is not the only one who had a background in law before he entered military training, and those who for a short time served as teachers may be counted in the hundreds.

Even in military training, where discipline and the military profession require the isolation of the army from politics, nationalist indoctrination is continued. Army officers often play an active part in the decision of national issues. A case in point is the Assyrian uprising in Iraq. The army officers moved to suppress the uprising not only because they were bound to do so by military order, but also because they had their own views on the matter and decided to solve the problem in a manner satisfactory to their own national consciousness. This explains why certain excesses were committed by the Iraqi army officers in handling this problem. The Palestine war, by far the most important issue and one which had a far-reaching effect on almost all the Arab countries, may be cited as another case in point. The views of the army officers, we now know, differed on many points from those of the politicians in power. Not only was the advice of the military regarding purely technical matters (such as the general command and the supply of weapons) not heeded by the politicians, but also the military had disagreed with their governments regarding the conduct and the prosecution of the war. In this, it is true, the army was under the influence of opposition parties (such as the Muslim Brotherhood), but the army officers also had their own political ideas, which differed from those of their governments. Thus it is clear why, after the Arabs lost the war, the Arab army officers and the politicians in power blamed each other for the blunders committed, and when the army felt it had unjustifiably been selected as the scapegoat, the officers reacted (to mention here only one specific reason) by overthrowing the politicians and punishing them for their mistakes. The recent military intervention in Lebanon has been temporary because of the relatively minor military role played by this country in the war. In Iraq, however, the army has already staged seven military coups, and its recent invitation to carry on the administration may be so tempting that it will once again dominate the political scene. The Jordanian army has long been under rigid British tutelage and therefore no move could be expected. But in the case of the Syrian and Egyptian armies, which were seriously beaten and had had a great deal to suffer on account of their governments' failure to supply weapons (in the case of Egypt the government supplied defective weapons), the army's intervention in politics may be regarded as a vindication of the army's role in the Palestine war and the failure of the politicians to support them.

Occupying such a high position in the national life of the Middle Eastern countries, the army officers were approached by various ideological and political groups (except perhaps the communists, who were severely punished if they did so) trying to win them to their side. Owing to the conservative and intensely nationalistic background of most of the army officers, it is not surprising that in the Iraqi and Egyptian armies the ultra-nationalistic and religious movements were the most influential, especially the Pan-Arab groups in Iraq and the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt. The Syrian army, emphasizing liberalism before anything else, has paid only lip service to religion and proved to be lukewarm to conservative and religious groups.

The elements which showed intense interest in political activities were the younger rather than the older army officers. Older men occupying high military positions and winning the favors of the heads of states and governments were likely to be more concerned with their own interests than with national reform. Some of these older officers held their positions not because of personal merit but for the purpose of insuring that the army would remain loyal to those in authority. Not infrequently some of them were related to the king or cabinet ministers and their interests thus became identified with those of the ruling oligarchy. As a result the younger army officers often organized themselves into small groups (either at informal friendly gatherings or in secret meetings) to discuss national issues. Not infrequently they broached the idea of the necessity of the army's intervention in order to overhaul the political machine, if not to establish a military dictatorship. The young army officers always chose their leaders from among the older army officers whom they could trust and whose records were clean. Such leaders were often chosen on the basis of seniority in military service, provided that their military integrity was beyond reproach and that they were not self-seeking. Thus Bakr Sidqi rose in Iraq, Husni Za'yim (replaced by Hinnawi and later by Shishakli) in Syria, and Muhammad Najib in Egypt. Their leadership and able command, recognized by all, had been tested in war: Bakr Sidqi in his operations against the Assyrian and Middle Euphrates tribal revolts; Za'yim, Shishakli and Najib in the Palestine war.

The underlying motive which prompted the army officers to engage actively in politics was, of course, the need for a social revolution which it was not possible to achieve by democratic procedures. The army seems to hold relatively moderate views acceptable to the majority of the people and is able to provide strong leadership capable of enforcing social reforms with celerity and a minimum of opposition. The people, ready to give the army officers an opportunity to try their approach to reform, have as a rule initially responded jubilantly to the change, though their enthusiasm, judging by the Iraqi and Syrian experiences, soon cools off, owing to the ruthless methods and continual repression which are likely to follow when reform measures are carried out by force.

The Palestine war has been singled out as the principal reason for the sudden military coups in Syria and Egypt. A state of intense fermentation, however, had long been in existence. Criticism of existing conditions had frequently been voiced, but no better occasion than the defeat suffered in Palestine had yet presented itself. It gave the critics an opportunity to demonstrate their dissatisfaction and to pour out their angry criticism of everything they considered wrong. Books and pamphlets, as well as newspaper articles, were published in an ever-increasing number; some of them—as had rarely happened in the past—went into several editions and were widely read all over the Arabic-speaking countries. Such pamphleteering, a novelty in the Middle East, released many dynamic forces. In his Meaning of the Tragedy,⁸ Costi Zurayk, then President of the Syrian University, was the first to discuss in a booklet the profound national frustration caused by the Palestine war. He called upon the people to press their rulers for reform. This was followed by another booklet, The Lesson of Palestine,⁹ written by a Palestinian lawyer, offering a constructive plan of social reform, including a Fertile Crescent unity scheme, and calling for immediate action. Most devastating of all, perhaps, is Khalid's From Here We Start,¹⁰ written by an Egyptian religious teacher, in which the whole religious system, as interpreted and practiced by Muslims today, is shown to be incompatible with modern life. Khalid rejected the restoration of a theocratic state and advocated the re-interpretation of Islam on a socialistic basis. In another book, entitled Citizens, Not Cattle,¹¹ Khalid attacked the oligarchic regime of Egypt and strongly defended the individual's rights to equality, liberty, education and work. His earlier book was at first suppressed by the government, but upon its release it went into several editions and was read all over the Arab world. Neither the government's opposition nor the severe and even vulgar criticism of his opponents could discourage Khalid from publishing his second book, which is even more trenchant than the first in its sweeping criticism of social conditions. These, as well as other less significant books, have been widely read and have had a far-reaching influence on public opinion.

The Palestine war brought matters to a head, since it directly involved the army in a struggle with the civilian politicians. The ruling oligarchy watched carefully lest it lose its hold over the army. When the Arab governments lost the war, the military, in spite of public statements that the war was satisfactorily conducted, were blamed for the defeat. This set in motion the movement, both in Syria and Egypt, to investigate the causes of defeat; but before investigations could reveal the malefactors, the politicians tried to influence the investigators. This aroused the army officers—who feared that the responsible politicians might escape punishment—and prompted them to act.

Four Middle Eastern countries may be specifically cited as having experienced military coups d'état: Turkey under late Ottoman rule, Iraq, Syria and Egypt. Two military coups took place in Turkey (1908, 1909); seven in Iraq (1936–1941); four in Syria (1949–1952); and two in Egypt (1881, 1952). (In Iraq the army has once more come into the picture in 1952, but this time by the invitation of the head of the state to maintain public order; in Lebanon the army acted only as a caretaker during the interim of a governmental change.) These fifteen military coups by no means exhaust the list. They have been selected as instances where the army has clearly taken control of the actual conduct of government, not merely where former army officers—as Kemal Atatürk and Shah Reza Pahlavi—played the role of the politician.¹²

All of these military coups took place either with the avowed purpose of re-establishing a constitutional regime (as in the case of Turkey) or of "cleansing" an already established democracy of evil influences which paralyzed its working. The military sought the active cooperation of nationalist elements and at the outset their rule was conducted in close cooperation with and was supported by the liberals. Later on the military dominated the scene and the liberals (if not the nationalists) were either pushed to the background or dropped from power. The religious groups have as a rule been reluctant to support military rule (except perhaps in Egypt, where the Muslim Brotherhood gave its blessing to General Najib), either because they had come to terms with former regimes (as in Turkey) or because their ideas proved to be too reactionary to be tolerated by the army (as in Iraq). In Syria the Muslim Brotherhood, even though it opposed the pre-military regime, failed to give support to the military because of their active cooperation with liberal elements.

The military pretended that they had assumed power either to prepare the way for liberal reforms or to carry out the reforms themselves. In reality they seized power without having been prepared for, or having had practical experience in, carrying out reforms. Their move to clean the Augean stables met universal approval, but this is a negative approach to reform. The Herculean task would be to carry out real social reform in a manner satisfactory to all. At best the reform program of the military was eclectic; it included various ideas and proposals that had become popular among the people, but these have rarely been integrated into a broad reform program, and plans for their implementation were lacking. A few liberal thinkers, such as Zia Gok Alp in Turkey and the Ahali group in Iraq, tried to formulate broad social programs for the movements they supported, but such philosophical apologiae had little or no influence on the minds of the military.¹³ Probably more serious attempts at agrarian reform have been considered, though not actually undertaken, under the military regimes of Syria and Egypt (the distribution of state-owned land among the peasants in Syria and the limitation of land-ownership to a legal maximum of two hundred acres in Egypt).¹⁴ But though these platforms have become popular among the masses, it would seem that the improvement of economic conditions depends primarily on finding new means of increasing agricultural production, not on merely distributing (as in the case of Syria) or re-distributing (as in Egypt) the land among a larger number of people. Syria needs both the capital and know-how—which she has refused to receive under the Point IV program—for the exploitation of its vast undeveloped territory, and Egypt, an already over-populated country, needs new means for increasing production, agricultural or otherwise, to make possible the achievement of social reform.

¹⁴ See texts of the Syrian land decrees and the Egyptian Land Reform Law in Middle East Journal, Vol. 7, pp. 69-81 (Winter, 1953).

The suspension of democratic life in favor of military rule, although greeted with almost universal approval, has its own weaknesses and evil influences. Most dangerous of all seems to be the difficulty in persuading the army, once the job of overhauling is done, to withdraw from politics or relinquish power. In spite of repeated assurances by leading army officers that their intervention was only temporary, the lessons of history are not reassuring. Military rule in Egypt (1881-1882), Turkey (1908-1918) and Iraq (1936-1941), showing no signs of withdrawal in favor of civil government, persisted until it was overthrown, in all the foregoing instances, as a result of war with foreign countries. In Syria the military have survived a period of four years and no indication has yet been given as to when military rule will end. They have avoided fighting with a neighboring country, which is still technically at war with Syria. Such a contest would test their strength and ability to survive. Their silence about war with Israel, a war which originally had given them an excuse to overthrow civilian rule, as well as their alignment with one Arab country against another, reflects their apprehension lest the military regime collapse from within or be overthrown by an attack from without. In the circumstances, military rule is likely to continue for an indefinite period in Syria as well as in other Arab countries, so long as public opinion remains dissatisfied with the civilian politicians and the army officers can maintain their reputation as the guardians of national interests. If, on the other hand, the army leaders should engage in an internecine struggle for power, as has happened in the past, there is a possibility that the military regime might eventually collapse from within.

Nor is the effect of politics on the military a happy one. "A general has only one aim," said Müffling, "a general who is also a sovereign must have two; his actions as a soldier will always be subordinate to politics."¹⁵ Politics imposes restraints upon sovereigns who, in their careers as generals, should not submit to political forces in order to achieve the highest military success. If the general ever proved to be a successful sovereign, he must have submitted to restraints which no successful general would tolerate. Sudden rise to power seldom permits its victims, except perhaps in exceptional cases, to adjust themselves to the new positions they occupy. The all-powerful leader is tempted to assume a charismatic character which often alienates his supporters and admirers. The Middle East experience with army rule demonstrates again the truth of the saying that "Power tends to corrupt, and absolute power corrupts absolutely." New leaders who swept to power to rid their people of arbitrary rule and corruption often could not avoid developing in themselves what they hated in their enemies.¹⁶ And this seems to have been true of Husni al-Za'iyim and ¹⁶ An Arab poet once remarked on the arbitrary rule of the military regime of the Young Turks who had overthrown Sultan Abdul-Hamid's regime in 1909:

But today of Hamid there's a thousand or so."
(Translation done in verse by Miss Katherine Parker.)

Shishakli in Syria no less than of Bakr Sidqi in Iraq. It is to be hoped that General Najib will be an exception to the rule.

Finally, a word may be said about the opinion prevalent among the Arabs, both military and civilians—comparing the progress made under the Kemalist regime with the state of anarchy and confusion in their countries—that each Arab country needs its own Kemal Ataturk to carry out reform with a strong hand. They often quote with approval the saying of Sayyid Jamal al-Din, a Muslim leader who advocated Pan-Islamism during the latter part of the nineteenth century, that the East cannot possibly be reformed save by a benevolent despot. When the Kemalist regime, after Ataturk's death, was transformed into a working democracy, it bolstered the army's argument that a great deal of spade work had to be done in the way of "cleansing" before the civilian politicians could be permitted to govern along democratic lines. The military, however, failed to understand that the Kemalist regime was not established overnight by entrusting power to the military, but that Kemal from the beginning made it clear to his fellow army officers that they had to choose between the army and politics. He launched his social reforms in the formative period by democratic methods, spending endless hours in trying to persuade his opponents, displaying patience and tolerance rarely to be found among statesmen with a military background. It was not until the Kurdish rebellion of 1925, when Kemal's prestige and power had already been established, that certain repressive measures were employed. The so-called loyalty trials, purging the regime of obstinate opponents, represented the only purge in the history of modern Turkey.

Ataturk's imitators in the neighboring Arab countries, misunderstanding the nature of Kemalism, tried at first to influence political decisions from behind the scenes, only to discover (facing non-cooperation or opposition from civilian politicians) that they had to take over the control of government themselves. In so doing, under the pretext of purging the regime of dangerous or corrupt personalities, they inaugurated a regime of repression which aroused anxiety and fear instead of inspiring order and security. General Bakr Sidqi not only exiled the leading ministers of the Cabinet he overthrew but also ordered the assassination of General Ja'far al-Askari and persecuted a dozen others; Colonels Za'yim and Shishakli arrested and exiled honest as well as corrupt people; and General Najib, following the same pattern, after forcing King Faruq to abdicate, arrested the King's entourage as well as other politicians on the grounds of corruption. There can hardly be an end to repression once it starts and it soon involves persons of integrity. The control of government by the military, ruling according to their light with no direct public restraint, creates a governmental problem no less difficult than the problem which prompted the army to seize power.

The basic factor underlying the passing of authority from civilian to military hands is the assumption that democracy has "failed." The people of the Middle East, without handing over authority to either right or left (the religious or the communistic) elements—though both of them came very near to seizing power—resorted to an old trick, which has now become fashionable, of removing the undesirable sovereign by turning his own Praetorian guard against him. While the military has reduced the danger of right or left rule, a greater difficulty has arisen. Once the army officers were firmly installed in the saddle, how could they be removed from their newly won positions? This seems to be—at least in the writer's opinion—the greatest of the dangers of military rule; for, conceding the valuable contribution of the army in carrying out certain reform measures quickly, the experiment may not be worth trying at the expense of suspending for an indefinite period the democratic processes of government. It is true that the operation of democracy has met with dissatisfaction in almost all Middle Eastern countries. This does not necessarily negate the generally accepted principle that government belongs to the people and, therefore, must be controlled by the people. If democracy has failed in the Middle East, it has failed only because it was transplanted into a social milieu unprepared for it.

The return to democracy, whatever the means to be employed for its restoration, seems to be the safest way towards ultimate stability and progress. In countries where the force of the old local traditions is still strong, it is not to be expected that the working of democratic institutions would admit of comparison with their operation in Western countries accustomed to democratic traditions. As Aristotle often affirms in the Politics, the citizen must be educated in the spirit of the constitution under which he lives. At present, the value of democracy must be regarded as mainly educational: that is, it must help to develop democratic habits and traditions necessary for the functioning of democratic machinery.¹⁷ If democracy has "failed" at all, it has failed because in a shrinking world the Middle Eastern people have become aware of their backwardness in comparison with the West; but it is not the fault of democracy that they did not catch up with the West. The fault lies with the people themselves. Not until the people are cured from within—socially and economically no less than politically—can they live a salutary democratic way of life. And this approach is not new to the Middle East. The Prophet Muhammad, in a Qur'anic injunction, reminded his people "Verily God changeth not that which is in a people until they change that which is in themselves." This change from within can be achieved only by sound education—which is lacking among the great majority of the people—an education which will provide them with the spirit of the constitution under which they live.

PARTISANSHIP AND COUNTY OFFICE: THE CASE OF OHIO

V. O. KEY, JR.

Harvard University

The textbooks contain singularly little systematic analysis of the role of party in local government. They abstract the relevant statutes. They expound more or less orthodox suppositions. Voting on local candidates corresponds closely with presidential voting. Party groups compete for control of local government more or less as they do on the national level. Or, the contrary notion is argued that party has little place in local politics. Personal followings or essentially non-party courthouse cliques determine all. This paper represents a modest attempt, by analysis of Ohio data, to test a few of the standard suppositions and to suggest lines of inquiry that might be fruitful in the study of local politics.¹

Relation of voting for county and presidential candidates. Contrary to the belief that the presidential tide almost invariably carries with it the local candidates of the winning party, the Ohio record indicates a fairly high degree of independence of national party trends in the selection of county officers. Although in most instances a Republican county presidentially chooses Republican county officers and a Democratic county, Democratic county officers, the departures from this consistency are of sufficient magnitude to excite attention. Figure 1 charts the proportions of the state's counties with Democratic presidential pluralities and the proportions of county offices won by Democratic candidates in presidential years from 1916 to 1948.² If the presidential candidate pulled all his fellow partisans into office with him, the two graphs would coincide. In fact, the cycle of party control of county office fluctuates over a considerably narrower range than does the cycle of county presidential pluralities. In periods of ascending Republican presidential strength, a goodly number of Democratic county candidates withstand the storm. At times of ascending Democratic presidential strength, Republican county candidates demonstrate staying power.

Although Figure 1 indicates the broad relationship of presidential and county polling, Table I on the 1948 election permits a more complete analysis. In that year in those counties at the extremes of party strength, as measured by the presidential vote, nearly all county offices went as did the presidential plurality. Counties with over 60 per cent of their vote for Dewey filled almost all their local offices with Republicans. Counties at the other end of the spectrum gave their votes generally to local Democrats as well as to Truman. As the presidential margin narrowed, the correspondence between presidential and local preferences declined sharply. Dewey carried 26 counties with 50-54.9 per cent of the vote but in these counties Republicans managed to capture only a few more than one-half of the county offices. In the close counties, a small amount of ticket splitting, of course, has a maximum effect.

² The county offices included in the computations underlying the graph were those listed as "county offices" in Ohio Election Statistics; legislators and judges are not so listed. Over the period covered by the graph there was change from time to time in the offices filled in presidential years.

The data of the table also permit a measurement of the gross local independence of presidential trends, while the spread between the curves on the chart indicates only the net difference between presidential and local voting. The Republican local winners in Democratic presidential counties and the Democratic local winners in Republican presidential counties accounted for a little more than one out of five county officers chosen in 1948. About the same ratio prevailed in 1944.³

Short-term resistances to presidential trends. Closer inspection may permit identification of types of situations in which local candidates and party groups are able to retain power despite a presidential trend to the opposite party. It is commonly thought that local candidates, especially in less populous counties, depend for success on the ties of friendship and personal acquaintance rather than the vote-pulling power of party. Such an explanation does not account for the regularities apparent in Figure 1. Evidently local candidates share in high degree the fate of the head of their ticket yet some local candidates of both parties resist the swing of popular sentiment against their national ticket.

One type of resistance to national trends may be of a short term nature. Those counties with an increasing Republican presidential strength may tend to retain for a time some local Democratic officials while those counties moving toward the Democratic party nationally by the same token may keep in office Republicans for a time. Various factors probably contribute to this effect. At times local organizations may knife the presidential candidate or at least drag their feet in the campaign. At other times the boosters of a presidential candidate may deem it inexpedient to say much about their local ticket. In some instances inter-party understandings may mitigate the hazards of party competition. Personal followings of individual local candidates may remain loyal despite the trend.

No simple test can be made of the supposition that there is a tendency for local candidates to overcome the effects of a short-term presidential trend toward the other party, for it is difficult to measure simply such a trend. Yet Table II represents an attempt to test the matter by an analysis of those counties Republican by a narrow margin in the 1948 presidential voting. It was assumed that the greater the number of times such a 1948 Republican county had gone Democratic in the four preceding presidential elections, the greater would be the likelihood that local Democratic officers and candidates had established a claim on the support of the community. Save for the exception of a category containing a single county, the distribution in Table II supports the assumption. In those counties narrowly for Dewey, Democratic county candidates had about seven chances out of ten to win if the county had given FDR pluralities at three of the four preceding elections. In those that had given a plurality to FDR only once in the four preceding elections, the Democratic local candidates had only about two chances out of ten to win.⁴

The same test, applied to those counties Democratic presidentially in 1948, yields the results shown in Table III. Those 1948 Democratic counties that had found no occasion to vote Republican in the preceding four elections had little use for Republican county candidates, although this ungenerous view came in part from the fact that some of them had quite high Democratic presidential percentages. On the other hand, 1948 Democratic counties that had taken advantage of two of the preceding four chances to vote Republican filled nearly one-fourth of their county offices with Republicans.

If these statistical manipulations give us a measure of short-term presidential trends, they indicate that the factors of friendship and personal acquaintance operate within a range of opportunity fixed by the general party trend. Sometimes that trend makes it easier for local Democrats to make friends; at other moments, the facility of Republicans in these matters appears to be superior. Yet it seems apparent that these local factors, be they "personal" or "party" in nature, operate to keep the fluctuations in party control of local office in a

⁴ These calculations are on the assumption that all local offices were contested. In 1944 almost 30 per cent of Ohio county offices were filled without contest in either the primary or the general election. The proportion filled without contest, however, declined as the presidential voting became closer.

Roots of local party groupings. Although some of the local-presidential differential in close counties may be a result of a short-term lag, it seems possible that in some counties the power groupings underpinning Democratic local success in counties Republican presidentially may be social structures of extraordinary durability rather than friable alliances susceptible of erosion by the storms of a national campaign or two. Clues pointing toward such a conclusion come from a closer examination of the 26 counties for Dewey in 1948 by 50-54.9 per cent of the vote. These counties elected Democrats to 43.6 per cent of their county offices. Some counties in the group elected the entire local Democratic slate; others chose some Democrats and some Republicans; a few elected only Republicans. Crawford, Fairfield, and Holmes put Democrats into all their county offices. These counties had gained some notoriety for Copperhead activity in the Civil War. Crawford County went Democratic in the gubernatorial elections of 1859, 1861, and 1863. In 1863 troops had to be sent into the county to complete the draft enrollment.⁵ Fairfield County, Democratic in 1859, 1861, and 1863, was the home of Edson B. Olds, a political leader whose outspoken reservations about Lincoln's war in 1862 led to his arrest and detention on a charge of discouraging enlistments in the Union Army.⁶ Holmes County had been the scene of Copperhead disturbances that succeeding generations reminisced about in the journals of the historical societies.⁷ Ancestral peccadilloes are minimized but the descendants seem to continue electing Democratic county officials.

⁷ W. W. Pennell and J. R. Vance, "Holmes County Rebellion—Fort Fizzle," Ohio Archeological and Historical Quarterly, Vol. 40, pp. 23-51 (Jan., 1931).

Such specific examples suggest that at least under certain circumstances local party structures may have extremely strong powers of self-perpetuation. Differences between presidential and local voting are not solely short-term lags but may be, in part at least, the product of local power groupings that persist for almost a century. To test this notion the rural counties, Republican in 1948 by 50-54.9 per cent, were extracted from Table II, on the assumption that in rural counties party groupings would have been least disturbed through time by such factors as immigration and urbanization. Of such 1948 Dewey counties, those that had been Democratic⁸ in the gubernatorial election of 1861 gave more than one-half of their 1948 county offices to Democrats; those that had been Unionist⁹ in 1861 gave only one-fourth of their county offices to the Democrats. The details are set out in Table IV.¹⁰

These data suggest that once a structure of power develops to link the local government with the community and to provide channels to positions of leadership, that structure, in the absence of inundation by migration or other external solvents, has a capacity to perpetuate itself over long periods of time even in resistance to national party trends. All of which points to the need for a better understanding of the socio-political structure of the community as it relates to local government, perhaps in particular to local rural government. The apparent durability of these community structures may be at the bottom of the frustrations of generations of reformers of county government as well as the immalleable quality of institutions of rural government.

Explanations of the durability of local party groupings must be sought in their historical development. In most of the 1861 Democratic counties in Table IV, for example, German settlers formed the core of the Democratic party.¹¹ In other rural Democratic strongholds the principal sources of settlement were southern. The faithful Republicanism of areas settled by New Englanders is well known. Detailed examination of voting in the state suggests the relevance of a political geology, an analysis of electoral behavior in terms of the strata of

⁹ Athens, Coshocton, Greene, Guernsey, Highland, Jackson, Lake, Ross, Vinton.

¹⁰ A similar analysis of those counties Republican in 1944 by 50-54.9 per cent and under 50 per cent urban showed that in 1944 the 1861 Democratic counties filled 71.1 per cent of the county posts with Democrats; the 1861 Unionist counties gave 22.2 per cent of their county offices to the Democrats. Of the twelve counties under 50 per cent urban and 50-54.9 per cent Republican in 1940, the 1861 Democratic counties filled 80.6 per cent of their county offices with Democrats; the 1861 Unionist counties gave only 25.0 per cent of their local offices to the Democrats.

attitudes and loyalties precipitated by different waves of settlement and of structures of attitude crystallized by great cataclysms such as the Civil War.¹² This sort of theory may seem to rest on an assumption that contemporary political groupings may have a ghostly family tree reaching deep into a politico-historical subconscious.¹³ Be that as it may, the relationships between past and present partisan behavior do not seem to be a matter of chance. To understand the mechanism by which local party groups are constructed and maintained through time might provide a better basis for comprehension of broader questions about the nature of party.

Comments. While these bits of evidence point to no earthshaking conclusions, they do pin down a few propositions and suggest lines for further inquiry.

1. While the trend in party control of county government moves with the presidential trend, local candidates of both parties in considerable degree withstand the tides that batter their presidential ticket. This differential points to a relatively high stability of partisan attitudes of electors with respect to local government, especially local rural government; it also points to the obverse

¹³ In fact, it also seems that ghostly descendants remain of partisan groups that once were far more corporeal. In 1944 Ohio had 28 rural counties that were predominantly Republican in the presidential voting in that year, that is, less than 40 per cent Democratic. Of the 28 counties 21 had been Unionist in 1867. In the seven 1867 Democratic counties, the Democrats in 1944 had nominees for 68.2 per cent of the county posts; in the twenty-one 1867 Unionist counties the Democrats had nominees for only 35.4 per cent of the county posts. In the seven 1867 Democratic counties some sort of Democratic group or tradition must have lingered on to produce competition for county office in spite of the fact that the counties had long since moved over to the Republican side of the fence.

phenomenon, perhaps more significant, of a relatively high volatility in the presidential vote.¹⁴

2. Local resistance to presidential tides seems to be based on local party groupings or loyalties with impressive capacities of survival. The analysis throws no light on the nature or mechanisms of these groupings save that they seem to maintain themselves over extremely long periods of time.

3. The success of local party groups, Republican and Democratic, in resisting swings against them in the presidential vote indicates that ticket splitting or "independence" represents not solely the chance differentiation of the merits of particular candidates or the random distribution of individual skill in cultivating the electors but in large measure a systematic resistance to the drag of the presidential trend. Local political competition seems to occur within a framework fixed by the presidential trend and the balance between local groups with roots in the far past. That is, the chances for the local candidate to separate himself from the presidential trend depend, perhaps at times unbeknownst to himself, on long established characteristics of the structure and behavior of his community as well as on the stage in the political cycle at which an election occurs.

4. The evidence gives some empirical basis for the old maxim that realistic state and local leaders should concern themselves chiefly with getting a presidential nominee able to pull their own slate into office. The systematic lag between local and presidential shifts supports the inference that, at least in rural counties, presidential candidates receive little help from their fellow partisans in county organizations. County cliques save themselves rather than stem the tide against their presidential candidate. County candidates of the local outs probably benefit from, rather than push along, a presidential tide toward the head of their ticket. All of which may contain implications of some importance for the nature of presidential politics and for the place of local organizations in the national party structure.

5. Even this sketchy analysis provides clues that could be followed up in the intensive study of individual counties. This suggests that comparative statistical analysis might be a means for elevating the case study of the specific local political situation from the human interest and anecdotal level to a status of usefulness in the general study of the political process. Differential statistical analysis may both aid in the perception of salient characteristics of particular situations and facilitate the production of pieces of research susceptible of being added together to enlarge the meager store of systematic knowledge about local politics.

¹⁴ The relationships shown in Figure 1 probably reflect the peculiar circumstances of Ohio, yet somewhat similar relationships appear in the Iowa data. That may be seen by placing on a chart the following series, in which the Democratic percentage of county offices is listed first after the date and then the percentage of counties with Democratic presidential pluralities: 1920, 12.0, 0.0; 1924, 15.4, 0.0; 1928, 12.9, 6.1; 1932, 36.5, 93.9; 1936, 34.8, 81.8; 1940, 21.9, 35.4; 1944, 16.7, 33.3; 1948, 20.3, 53.6. The figures were built up from the listing of county officials in the Iowa bluebook. The 1928 and 1932 figures may not be exactly comparable with those of other years as the bluebook did not list county supervisors for those years.

BRITISH BY-ELECTIONS, 1952

RICHARD M. SCAMMON

Department of State

In October, 1951 Winston Churchill returned to head Britain's government; the Labor ministry which had held power since the summer of 1945 had been narrowly defeated in a general election and Clement Attlee's six years as Britain's first Minister were ended. But this change of leadership marked no change in the British political wars—and one of the most interesting, and most revealing, of the areas of these wars has been that of the by-elections.

These by-elections, special votes to fill vacancies in the House of Commons, took place in ten widely separated districts during the fourteen months from the general election of October, 1951 to the end of 1952. Four of the vacancies they were held to fill were caused by the death of a sitting MP, two by resignation, and the other four by elevation or succession of the incumbent to the House of Lords.

Of the elections, seven were held in England, one in Scotland (East Dundee) and two in Northern Ireland. Though six of the ten constituencies involved are so-called "borough" seats and four "county" seats, eight were, in fact, urban, two of the "county" seats (Cleveland and Farnworth) being actually urban areas despite their legal designation. With two of these urban constituencies strongly Tory seaside towns (Southport and Bournemouth), the percentage totals for the parties shown in Table I are slightly more inclined to the Conservative side than the national percentages for the last general election.¹

To fill these ten vacancies only nine actual contests were held. In the North Antrim district, the then "Father" of the House, Sir Hugh O'Neill, resigned

TABLE I. VOTE FOR CANDIDATES IN CONTESTED 1951 GENERAL AND 1952 BY-ELECTION CONSTITUENCIES, UNITED KINGDOM HOUSE OF COMMONS

Candidates	October, 1951 General Election	1952 By-Elections
Nine Conservative candidates	221,820 (50.5%)	167,209 (49.4%)
Nine Labor candidates	201,441 (45.9%)	158,778 (46.9%)
Liberal candidates (three at GE, two at 1952 by-elections)	15,693 (3.6%)	7,449 (2.2%)
All other candidates (none at GE, three at 1952 by-elections)	—	4,914 (1.5%)
Totals	438,954	338,350

The totals above exclude the uncontested North Antrim seat; the Conservative figures include the Ulster Unionist candidate at South Belfast and the "Conservative and National Liberal" candidate at East Dundee.

his seat after 37 years of parliamentary service, to be succeeded by his son—Phelim O'Neill. At the general election and at the by-election the return of the Ulster Unionist O'Neills was unopposed. The politics of Ulster, mixed as they are with strong religious feelings, change little. Unopposed returns are not uncommon in this area and the North Antrim seat (and the double-member Antrim constituency preceding it) has been without contest in six of the nine general elections since 1922.

As has been generally the case with parliamentary by-elections, voter interest fell below that of the general election in October, 1951. Without exception the participation was lower at the by-elections than at the general vote, the average decline being around 11,200 votes. Only in the Wycombe division did the participation even approach that of the general election. In this constituency, won by the Conservatives with a narrow 1753 vote majority in 1951, the drop in total vote was only 1015, but in all other seats it ran much higher.

Politically the majority of these ten districts must be regarded as "safe"—Leeds and Small Heath for Labor, Bournemouth, Southport, North Antrim, and South Belfast for the Conservatives. Two others have substantial Labor majorities—Farnworth and East Dundee. Only two could be regarded as peripheral—Cleveland and Wycombe. Given this political complexion, it is not surprising that there were no changes in the party loyalties of the constituencies involved—five remained Labor, five remained Conservative. Moreover, the percentage shifts represented in Table I (overall) and Table II (constituency-by-constituency) are small indeed. For the whole United Kingdom the shift is but a single vote in a hundred, this single elector moving from Conservative over to Labor.

This shift appears to have been somewhat stronger in the first half of the year as represented by Leeds, Southport, and the single summer by-election—East Dundee. In the Fall, however, the balance appears to have been almost equal, with no one of the by-elections in October and November showing shifts of as much as a single percentage point, save at Small Heath, where the absence of a Liberal candidate made the circumstances non-comparable. In the four Fall by-elections excluding Small Heath and North Antrim (unopposed), Labor gained in two (seven-tenths of a percentage point at Farnworth and eight-tenths at South Belfast) and the Tories in two (seven-tenths of a point at Cleveland, three-tenths at Wycombe).

Of all the by-elections, Labor bettered its position in six, the Conservatives in two, with the circumstances of two not comparable. At South-East Leeds, South Belfast, and Farnworth, Labor polled a higher percentage vote in a straight fight. At Southport and at Small Heath, Labor gained more from the Liberals' lowered poll or failure to fight than did the Conservatives.² At East Dundee in July Scottish Nationalist and Independent candidates polled

² This is to be especially noted in the light of the generally accepted proposition that Liberals forced to choose between Labor and Conservative tend to vote in the ratio of 2:1 or 5:3 for the Conservative candidate.

TABLE II. COMPARATIVE POLLING PERCENTAGES

Class A. Constituencies with straight Labor-Conservative contests at both the General Election and the By-Election:

		Conservative	Labor
South-East Leeds (February)	GE	39.5	60.5
	By	36.8	63.2
Cleveland (October)	GE	45.2	54.8
	By	45.9	54.1
Wycombe (November)	GE	51.7	48.3
Farnworth (November)	GE	40.8	59.2

Class B. Constituencies with Liberal candidates at the General Election, the By-Election, or both:

		Conservative	Labor	Liberal	Independent
East Bournemouth and Christchurch (February)	GE	63.3	25.1	11.6	—
Southport (February)	GE	60.2	24.8	15.0	—
	By	62.0	28.5	9.5	—
Small Heath (November)	GE	30.9	63.4	5.7	—
	By	33.0	67.0	—	—

Class C. Constituencies with multi-partite contests at either the General Election or the By-Election, but uncontested by Liberals:

		Conservative	Labor	Independent
East Dundee (July)	GE	46.2	53.8	—
	By	35.6	56.2	8.2

Class D. Constituencies in Northern Ireland:

		Ulster Unionist (Conservative)	Labor
North Antrim (October)	GE	Unopposed	—
	By	Unopposed	—
South Belfast (November)	GE	75.8	24.2

8.1 per cent of the vote, but Labor still managed to increase its 1951 strength by 2.5 percentage points while the Conservatives lost the difference—10.6.

At Cleveland and Farnworth the Conservatives made their only gains—small percentage increases in straight fights with Labor—and in two constituencies the circumstances of the by-election made comparison with the October, 1951 vote of no value. In one of these—North Antrim—an Ulster

Unionist (Conservative) was returned unopposed at both elections; in the other—Bournemouth—a by-election Independent polled 4.7 per cent of the votes, drawing about equally from Conservative, Labor, and Liberal, and leaving no definable trend for the division.

Given the small shifts involved in these by-elections of 1952 it would be impossible to predict the course of the next British general election with any surety, the more so since the later by-elections have not small, but tiny, changes. However, past by-elections have been very sound in predicting at least the general trend of subsequent general elections and there is no reason to believe the future will be any less reliable than the past. For those concerned with the results of the next British general election, the by-elections of 1953 and 1954 should prove most revealing.

One of the first projects UNESCO undertook, so we are told in the introduction to the volume Contemporary Political Science, was a review of "methods in Political Science." Among the reasons there given are its "newness," the "uneven character of its present development," and the "distinct trends to be observed." The author of this introduction, Massimo Salvadori, thinks that "certainly" political science is more recent than law, political economy and sociology. This seems a strange assertion in view of the fact that the Greeks, who started many of the modern sciences, recognized a distinct political science of high sophistication, while they did not initiate a science of law, and did not recognize a distinct science of either political economy or sociology. As to the scientific claims of sociology, the world of scholarship is divided to this day. But the view expressed by the writer of the introduction does not seem to be shared by many of the contributors to the volume, who variously trace political science back to the sixteenth century or to antiquity. Salvadori himself speaks of the foundation of the chair of politics at the University of Upsala in the seventeenth century. (The date is not 1662, as here given, but 1622, as correctly stated by Hastad on page 150.) The only reason for mentioning this matter is that there would be little basis for undertaking such a review, if political science were so recent a newcomer; actually it is probably one of the oldest of all sciences. As for the other two reasons, we know of no field of research in which development is not uneven, if by that vague phrase is meant that some aspects of it are more fully developed than others, nor do we know of one in which there are not various distinct trends. In short, we conclude that UNESCO had no particular reason for starting with political science, except that those in charge are interested in it, as indeed they well might be. As regards this point, one is tempted to quote from Thomas I. Cook's able paper: "... political science in the United States has grown rapidly as an independent discipline, but ... is more independent than disciplined, has revolted unduly against its progenitors, and has become as rootless as it is active."

UNESCO's report is divided into two major parts, one presenting individual papers on political science in the various countries; the other, papers on specific fields. The second part is subdivided into four chapters, dealing with political institutions; parties, groups and public opinion; international relations; and the organization of teaching and research. However, these latter topical divisions are actually organized according to the country pattern also, resulting inevitably in a good deal of overlapping. Part One is rather ambitiously entitled: "Political Science: Object, Methodology, Theory and Surveys." Austria, India, France, Switzerland, Uruguay, Sweden, the Middle East, Canada, Poland, Argentina, the United States, Mexico, Brazil, Italy, Spain, the Netherlands, Great Britain, Japan, Australia, the USSR, Belgium and China are dealt with, and in this order. Why in this order? Because the editors—unfortunately—decided to print the papers in accordance with the alphabetical order of the authors. The haphazard nature of the compilation could not have been more vividly portrayed than by this device. Actually, the United States is represented by three and France by two papers; no explanation is given for this plethora of material. The most striking omission is Germany; it is brought in by the back door, so to speak, in an undistinguished and obsolete paper by Adamovitch, the venerable Austrian judge whose old-fashioned notions are further mangled by a poor translation. The omission is the more astonishing, since a number of the other papers refer again and again to the fact that political science in their countries follows the German tradition, or insist upon the basic importance of such German authors as Max Weber, Hegel or Marx. Yet the editors evidently never caught on.

It is manifestly impossible to do justice to the many interesting perspectives that the several country reports open up. Suffice it to say that the best ones among them avoid the unfortunate tendency of many to present essentially a selected bibliography of recent writings in the broad field of politics. Would it not have been wiser to organize an appendix in which a selected bibliography covering all the countries might have been compiled, thus freeing the authors of these papers for more penetrating analysis? Would it not also have been wiser to group these papers in accordance with such broader regional patterns as Latin America, Scandinavia, and the British Dominions? Surely the report would have gained in both lucidity and comprehensibility from such a procedure.

R. Aron's paper on political science in France and that of B. S. Keirstead and F. M. Watkins on Canada are perhaps the best, with W. A. Robson's on Great Britain following closely. In these three studies there emerges a clear picture of how political science is placed within the totality of the social sciences. Robson's paper, while reviewing particular works, still manages to bring out the vital empirical pattern of British political science; he notes that in spite of fine work in theory and its history, there is an insufficient link between political theory and practice which is perhaps not unrelated to another defect, namely that "political theory in Great Britain has proceeded on the assumption that men are rational beings." A theory cast into such a rationalistic frame cannot but remain remote from studies of political reality. Canadian political science appears to be suffering from the same defect, reinforced by the close association with and subordination to economics which has been Canada's special tradition. France, by contrast, has neither the realistic and empirical studies of Great Britain and Canada, nor the rationalistic theory, but instead "has clung desperately to its inherited ideologies; it has continued the out-moded debate between the ancient monarchy and the revolution; it has concentrated only on the peculiar treasures of her own political arrangements." But even as regards the latter, Aron's paper is filled with questions rather than reviews of work accomplished and he grimly notes that this may be due to the French preference for discussion rather than investigation. What he considers the twofold indifference to fact and theory alike, while certainly noticeable in France, is equally characteristic of most of Europe, with few exceptions.

Needless to say, it is impossible to enter here into a discussion of the numerous substantive papers in the sections dealing with specific fields, such as comparative institutions, local government, parties and public opinion, and international relations. While a number of the individual papers are interesting, the total effect is a considerable hodge-podge, with no attempt to establish any sort of coordination or interrelation. I found the paper by M. Duverger on the study of political institutions in France interesting, though it too is largely bibliographical. The author's bias is revealed in, for example, his firm praise of Charles Maurras. Such praise is, of course, traditional with French intellectuals, and shows their tendency to overvalue brilliance as contrasted with soundness, and literary merit above scientific breadth and thoroughness. Another good paper is contributed by Merle Fainsod on the study of government and economic life. The author's established competence in the field and methodological sophistication oblige him to recognize the limitations of political science in the field of public economic policy, yet he is right in insisting that "the political scientist has an important contribution to make to the analysis of public economic policy." Unfortunately, it remains somewhat uncertain just what this specific contribution might be.

Papers by F. Goguel, Peter Odegard and D. Thomson on the state of research on parties and public opinion in France, the United States, and Britain, respectively, reflect the professional quality of their authors; yet one wonders whether an exchange of the papers among them and eventual consolidation into one comprehensive and comparative analysis would not have been more revealing. For even the basic referents, such as the party, are at variance, and no attempt is made to correlate the several analyses with some of the leading definitions. Similar general comments might be made about the section on international relations. Here we find five papers, dealing with international relations in the Soviet Union, France, Britain, the United States, and "German-speaking countries." The last, by Verdross of Vienna, deals only with international law. The greatest defect in this section is the failure to take adequate account of the very considerable contribution diplomatic historians have made to the field of international relations in Europe; the whole section is rather juridical in its orientation.

All in all, it is very doubtful, in the opinion of this reviewer, whether the approach followed in this volume was the wise one, if an assessment of contemporary political science was desired. For the broader lines of development are obscured, the relations with the other social sciences are dealt with incidentally and inconsistently, and the future course of the field is left obscure. The attempt to bring the Soviet Union into such an appraisal is of dubious value, since no political science worthy of the name does or can exist in totalitarian dictatorships; the virtual omission of Germany gives the whole the quality of a torso.

Two fairly recent studies in method may serve as a contrast to the UNESCO report. One, Wilson Gee's Social Science Research Methods, demonstrates that treating the methodological issues of all the social sciences together has distinct advantages. The author, after some rather pedestrian introductory comments on the social sciences and current trends, and on the meaning of research, takes up what he calls the "logical methods," and follows this with a chapter each on the case method, the statistical method, the historical method, the survey method, and the experimental method. Since the book is intended as a teaching aid, each chapter is rounded out by some questions and suggested readings. Yet, curiously, the treatment does not touch upon Max Weber or Pareto, upon Lasswell, Kluckhohn or Mead, in short upon the sharp controversies raging at present. It is, however, built upon certain particular works, e.g., A. Wolf's, the entire treatment proceeding in the form of extended quotations and connecting comment.

Very different is the approach of Kurt Lewin's Field Theory in Social Science. For here we have expounded, in a series of papers, the brilliant methodological approach of the late author, one of the outstanding psychologists of our time. Lewin does not actually deal with political science, but the bearing is clear. He asserts that "power does not have the same dimension as psychological force." For that reason, Lewin would not identify the "power field" with the "force field." The greater power of A may not mean pressure upon the lesser power of B. Interestingly enough, Lewin suggests further that values are constructs which have the same psychological dimension as power fields. These are intriguing suggestive generalizations which certainly deserve further exploration by political scientists.

If Gee's is a general survey, and Lewin's is a specific challenge, they yet both have more significance in connection with any discussion of methodology in political science than the vague, inchoate, and contradictory suggestions on the subject contained in the UNESCO volume. It seems very clear that if UNESCO wishes to make real contributions to the international cooperation of researchers and intellectuals, it will have to free itself of the tendency to international kowtowing, of the tendency to avoid conflict and controversy, and of the fear of "taking a stand." This reviewer cannot help feeling that three or four group reports, made after a sufficient number of get-togethers by individuals outstanding in three or four countries where something is happening, and implemented by a discriminating annotated bibliography, would have told the reader a great deal more about contemporary political science than does the volume here reviewed.

C. J. FRIEDRICH.

Harvard University.

The New Science of Politics: An Introductory Essay. BY ERIC VOEGELIN.
(Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. 1952. Pp. xiii, 193. $3.00.)

Professor Voegelin occupies an unusual place in American political science. He is one of the most distinguished interpreters to Americans of the non-liberal streams of European thought. To this professional vocation he brings a remarkable breadth of knowledge, and a historical imagination that ranges frequently into brilliant insights and generalizations. With such a peculiar excellence, he reduces the shock to the average political scientist when he is led outside of the presuppositions of liberalism, a shock that is a part both of the process of self-interpretation and self-education.

The current volume thinks of a new political science as the body of theory that is emerging from the obsolescence of positivist liberalism (pp. 8 ff.). A new science of politics will theorize until its principles meet the philosophy of history, and until there is a return to consciousness of principle. According to Voegelin, "the attack on metaphysics can be undertaken with a good conscience only from the safe distance of imperfect knowledge" (p. 20). The author develops his case almost entirely outside of the vocabulary of traditional political science, but this is probably the only way by which the alternative interpretation can be stated with effectiveness. Every society, the author believes, is seeking a principle of self-interpretation and a statement of what it represents. Three levels are offered on which this objective may be stated: the elemental, the existential, and the transcendental. At the elemental level, one may describe the structural articulation of modern representative government; at the existential, one reaches a symbolism or a statement of meaning of the political truth that a society embodies (pp. 59 ff.); and at the transcendental level the great dualisms of human experience return, in which theory at its best may explain death, love, and justice.

It is, of course, the transcendental level and its relation to the science of politics that concern the author. Between 800 B.C. and 300 B.C. the human mind opened; it became conscious of philosophy in the Greek sense, and the idea of the "theory" of politics was born. However, the philosopher was the true type, as he sought the explication of the transcendental experience of men, while the intellectual or the sophist failed to become a "mature man" in the Aristotelian meaning of the word. Likewise, the philosopher was concerned with the relation of man to God, and the judgment of social relations in this light. The psyche became the sensorium of transcendent truth, while society became in measure a representative of it as well. In essence, Voegelin seeks to demonstrate that the maximum differentiation of human experience is to be found in philosophy and in Christianity; here is the orbit of theory; it is here that the emergence of a new science of politics is to be observed; and it is here that the doxai or ideologies of liberal revolt attack with desperate but failing hope.

Voegelin describes various historical situations. He deals with the struggle within the Roman Empire between the old representation and the new Christian force; the Puritan ideology, and the caustic analysis offered by Richard Hooker of the new mass movement; and the Hobbesian statement of a civil theology, ending in the totalitarian movements of our time. But what he is concerned with primarily is that the effort to divinize the here and now, the temporal order, means the suppression of the truth of the soul in favor of a civil theology. Modernity in essence began in the ninth century of our era, and it was and has been precisely the effort through knowledge to make society imminent and divine. This Voegelin calls the "Gnostic Revolution," that gained force with Joachim of Flora's "Third Realm" and ends in the present, for the totalitarianism of our time is the "journey's end of the Gnostic search for a civil theology" (p. 163). Modernity is simply the growth of Gnosticism.

The author takes his stand with the truth of the soul and against the civil theology that seeks to unite the existential with the transcendental. During the last half century the reconstruction of a science of man on such a basis has made its advances. Its exponents see that the Gnostic dream world is not the real world, and for them there is no sliding transition from liberalism to communism that may be observed in a modern writer like Harold Laski. Its exponents show no intellectual paralysis before either National Socialism or communism, that is, before modernity without restraint. Among the English and the Americans, thinks Voegelin, one finds the greatest restraint, and here perhaps in the end the truth of soul can resist the modern Gnostic and liberal revolution. Voegelin would insist, and this is surely part of his achievement, that there can be a science of politics that is not mere elemental analysis of power or the group process, and which is likewise not merely the mythology of a total nation; it will not be the currently conventional liberal or secular science of politics, for it will rest on the Greek and Christian vision of philosophy.

Georges Sorel, Prophet Without Honor: A Study in Anti-Intellectualism. BY RICHARD HUMPHREY. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1951. Pp. 246. $4.00.)

The Genesis of Georges Sorel: An Account of His Formative Period Followed by a Study of His Influence. BY JAMES H. MEISEL. (Ann Arbor, Mich.: George Wahr Publishing Company. 1951. Pp. 320. $5.00.)

These two studies (together with Scott H. Lytle's succinct essay in Modern France, edited by E. M. Earle, Princeton, 1951) represent the most ambitious efforts yet made in English to interpret the thought of the "baffling, misunderstood, and maligned" Georges Sorel. It is sometimes a minor catastrophe in scholarship when two texts on the same subject appear simultaneously, but such is not the case here. Each author has his own purpose and viewpoint, and each sheds much new light on a complex personality and the intellectual environment in which he lived. Humphrey's work is the slighter of the two, yet stands as a model of well arranged, if not always conclusive, analysis. Professor Meisel's study suffers from loose organization, and incidentally from a distracting lithoprint crawling with mechanical errors; but these deficiencies are more than compensated by his penetrating insights and the richness of his documentation. Of particular interest is his presentation of Sorel's relationships with Croce, Pareto, and Michels, and his discussion of Sorel's influence.

Humphrey starts from the essential point that the "unity of Sorel's work, and its real impetus, are to be found in his unremitting search for some new ethical principle that might bring about a rejuvenation of modern society" (p. 9). This moral impulse was joined to a pessimistic belief that all cultures are subject through history to the forces of entropy and decadence, stayed only by occasional moments of grandeur in which a new faith, an ideology reflecting material conditions yet also the result of individual and social will, recreates a dynamic unity. For his own day Sorel concluded (at least in his Reflections on Violence, 1908) that a new morality must be sought in the discipline of creative, autonomous, industrial labor; while a new faith could be borne only through the myth of the general strike, which would bring into play the essential idealism, the sense of personal significance and responsibility, of the proletariat. Violence must be threatened, if not actually invoked, to produce a sharp division between the classes and a decisive result. Finally, from the feelings aroused by the challenge of the syndicalist strike would come the motivations for a substantial advance in the quality and quantity of the industrial product.

What are we to make of this ingenious hypothesis, put together in Sorel's book-cluttered garret in Boulogne-sur-Seine, and flashing the facets of Rousseau's general will, Hegel's free spirit, Proudhon's morality of labor, Marx's class struggle, and Bergson's élan vital? Humphrey's thesis is that while Sorel's formula is a disappointment as a description of the actual course of the syndicalist movement, it nonetheless reveals a profound understanding of the causes and the necessary cure of the sickness of industrial civilization. He suggests that Sorel is to be grouped with Nietzsche and Freud. "All three of them saw that the system of organization that was giving man unparalleled power over his environment could at the same time create such an intolerable burden that the individual might well be crushed by it. Whether they set as their ideal the superman, the whole man, or the creatively free workingman, they were seeking in the best tradition of humanism for a set of values that might permit man to express himself in responsible action with his fellows" (p. 218). "All of these images represent . . . man freely conscious of his power and exercising it without fear in the control of his environment" (pp. 220-221).

Humphrey has found the right company for Sorel, but his generosity in concluding that "the basic problem remains as he stated it" (p. 223), strikes one as excessive. It is now too late to admire the glittering paradox involved in verbalizations that assert that the power drive in individuals and in groups must be freed rather than repressed as the condition for the realization of creative harmony. With Sorel the myth of syndicalist violence swallows up any criteria of "humanism" or "responsible action" that might inform the search for a "set of values." The ultimate premise of Sorel's system was stated in his early work, Le procès de Socrate (Paris, 1889, p. 44): "According to a law of our nature we wish to have something indemonstrable to believe." Even if one accepts this metaphysic (Humphrey apparently does; this reviewer does not), the difficulties of showing how socially useful indemonstrable values, apart from the value of conflict as an end in itself, can emerge from a context of social violence are not resolved by an appreciation of the poetic character of Sorel's imagery.

Meisel's researches probe beneath the surface of this problem. One key to the puzzle of Sorel he finds in Croce's criticism of Sorel's methodology. Croce had pointed out (in a preface to the Italian edition of the Reflections) that Sorel attempts to separate scientific history and religious faith, making the former simply a factual description of the impact of the latter on human institutions. But this is impossible. All history includes a judgment of the causes and consequences of faith, because all history is an interpretation of reality conducted more or less consciously in terms of philosophical categories. Meisel observes: "The most dangerous character of this thrust is obvious; Sorel's rejection of psychologic history, on the surface of it a defense of theology, is also, and perhaps primarily, the vindication of his doctrine of the social Myth as a force impervious to all factual inquiry. If religious faith has to 'show cause' as to its scientific value, then the secularized faith that mirrors itself in a myth, likewise becomes subject to the pragmatic test; in losing its charmed character it preserves little if anything of its usefulness as a suggestive doctrine of political action" (p. 285). Clearly, it is this device of holding the content of the myth sacrosanct that enables Sorel to indulge in the illogic of deriving from it the union of individual creativity with mass action, faith and heroism with material objectives, and increased production with industrial strife.

Meanwhile the prediction of the impact of the myth proved to be something less than scientifically accurate. Meisel traces the present irrelevance of syndicalist theory to the simple fact that "time has run out on the proletariat, heroism or no heroism" (p. 279). It was necessary to Sorel's theory that the capitalist power remain in force. But the shift from a capitalist dominated economy to a state socialism friendly to the workers happened before the proletariat had sufficient time to develop its full strength or its new morality. However, the possibility must be recognized that syndicalist theory may still have its influence in a context not conceived by Sorel; perhaps, as Meisel suggests, as part of a reaction to the bureaucratization of democratic socialism, more probably among those peoples where the workers' interest has become the touchstone of political ideology and where there yet exists some desire to escape the totalitarian impasse reached by Marxism in Russia.

To read these two important treatises is to become aware that Sorel reveals, as few other thinkers, the preoccupations, the subtleties, and the torments of contemporary French politics. His defense of the myth of syndicalist violence as an adequate secular response to a deeply felt need for a unifying ethic illustrates the French capacity for making the rejection of faith a faith in itself.

His ability to project hypotheses unhindered by empirical considerations suggests the gulf that exists between thought and action in French political life. His pessimism is the natural consequence of the fact that every French revolution has ended in a disappointment. He was not so much the prophet of the modern age as the victim of his country's history.

Morals and Law: The Growth of Aristotle's Legal Theory. BY MAX HAMBURGER.
(New Haven: Yale University Press. 1951. Pp. xvi, 191. $3.75.)

The commendable purpose of the present work is to determine "What theories [of jurisprudence] of enduring value" are to be found in Aristotle's Ethics, Politics, and Rhetoric (p. xiii). The author is severely critical of the "super-historicism" that confuses the account of "the historical and genetic development of Aristotle's mind and work" with the "essence of his teachings" (pp. xi, xii). This would seem to promise an interpretation and evaluation of Aristotle's legal theory, with the genetic method used only as an instrument to establish the meaning of Aristotle's text. Unfortunately, however, much of the book is a polemic against Werner Jaeger and "his pupil Walzer." The weight of the attack, moreover, bears not on the genetic method, as abused by historicism, but on a specific application of that method by Jaeger. Jaeger had maintained that the Magna Moralia was a short manual compiled by a late peripatetic, out of the Eudemian and Nicomachean Ethics. Hamburger asserts that it is an early and authentic work of Aristotle. In the opinion of this reviewer, the method employed by Hamburger is not fundamentally different from that of Jaeger, and is insufficient to decide the question.

It is to the author's credit that he himself states the most telling objection to this method: "Jaeger, in his startling theory, had arranged the eight books of the Politics in a genetic sequence III, II, VII, VIII, IV, V, VI, I, supposedly corresponding to diverse 'strata' in Aristotle's development. In the introduction to his recent translation of the Politics [Sir Ernest] Barker restores the original order I-VIII. Here the crucial question is whether a 'realistic' method can be distinguished from an earlier 'idealistic' one belonging to a time when Aristotle was still under the influence of Plato. According to Barker—and the present writer concurs—the only conclusion warranted in this connection is that Aristotle handled different themes in different ways" (p. 3). Barker's critique of Jaeger pointed out that the problem of explaining the diverse "strata" exists only if one assumes that the different parts of the Politics are mutually inconsistent. And Barker has shown convincingly, I think, that this assumption is untenable.

Hamburger's chronology, like Jaeger's, is determined by the interpretation of the texts it is meant to fit. He takes up a number of juridical topics, then summarizes or paraphrases successively the arguments of Magna Moralia, the Eudemian Ethics, and the Nicomachean Ethics. There follows a comparison of the several accounts "with regard to their perfection in relation to pre-Aristotelian thought and to the degree of their perfection" as representations of Aristotelian thought (p. 5). It will be seen from this that everything depends upon how Aristotelian thought in its perfection is conceived. This decided, the chronology follows, so that, e.g., if it is discovered that the formulations of the Nicomachean Ethics are generally the longest of the three, this can be held to represent the fullness of maturity; but when that work happens to be the briefest on a given point, the superiority of conciseness is acclaimed. It is unfortunate for his general chronological thesis that the author agrees with von Arnim that "the crowning word of Peripatetic Ethics, for which we wait in vain in EN [Nicomachean Ethics] or even in EE [Eudemian Ethics]" is a passage in Magna Moralia. This should make it a late work. Since, however, Magna Moralia is held to be immature in comparison with the other works, someone might have concluded that Jaeger was right in regarding this immaturity as a sign of spuriousness. Therefore a passage from Magna Moralia was needed, rising "to such heights of lucidity in formulating the leitmotiv of Aristotelian Ethic" that it would be "hard to believe that a Peripatetic of Theophrastus' day, so indifferent to precise definition" could have written it (p. 6). This passage, which is held to represent "the quintessence of Aristotelian ethics strikingly opposed to Socratic-Platonic rationalism," reads: "Speaking generally, it is not the case . . . that reason is the principle of and guide to virtue, but rather the feelings." This opposition is much less striking, however, when the passage is read along with the immediately preceding sentence. There it is asserted that virtue requires both right reason and disciplined passions, and that neither alone is sufficient. Similarly, when the author paraphrases Aristotle to say, in the Nicomachean Ethics, that "All virtues are a mean between two extremes" he neglects the important qualification that "what is intermediate is [also] an extreme," and hence that virtue is an extreme "with regard to what is best and right" (Nicomachean Ethics, 1107a9). Finally, the author is so impressed by Aristotle's repeated asseverations that ethics and politics are the sphere of probable, rather than necessary reasoning, that he does not consider that the general context within which they occur might affect their meaning. Accordingly, at the end of the book he identifies Aristotle with John Dewey in the view that "there is no absolute certainty within the domain of morals and law," and with Bertrand Russell in the view that " 'ultimate questions of value . . . are legitimately matters of feeling' " (pp. 164, 165). Yet is there, according to Aristotle, anything more certain than the superiority of the philosophic life to, e.g., the political life? Or that those who feel otherwise are simply wrong? (Cf. Nicomachean Ethics, 1177a18 and b15 ff.)

These objections suggest the kind of problems which would have to be resolved before the author's interpretation of Aristotle's ethical writings could be taken as authoritative. Without such resolution, his discussion of the chronology of the texts seems destined to be as inconclusive as Jaeger's discussion of the order of the books of the Politics appears in the light of Barker's critique.

Ethics in Government. BY PAUL H. DOUGLAS. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1952. Pp. ix, 114. $2.25.)

Morality in American Politics. BY GEORGE A. GRAHAM. (New York: Random House. 1952. Pp. xiii, 337. $3.50.)

Ethical Standards in Government. (REPORT OF A SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE, 82nd Cong., 1st session. 1951. Pp. iii, 89.)

Establishment of a Commission on Ethics in Government. (HEARINGS BEFORE A SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE, 82nd Cong., 1st sess. 1951. Pp. v, 577.)

Senator Douglas and Professor Graham were associated in the work of the Douglas subcommittee on ethics in government which made its report in 1951, the Senator as chairman and the professor as a consultant. Each of them has now set forth his own additional reflections upon the troublesome problems of ethics and morality in American government and politics. In the main, they agree in their interpretation of the great wealth of data produced in the hearings before the subcommittee and there is a basic consistency in their proposals for improvement. Senator Douglas concentrates his diagnosis within a narrower range of problems and emerges with recommendations which are more concrete. Professor Graham probes more widely and deeply (in three times as many pages) and is more cautious in his prescriptions.

The most striking characteristic of these three commentaries on governmental ethics is the consensus among them concerning major premises (an agreement shared in considerable part also with Paul H. Appleby's Morality and Administration in Democratic Government). This consensus may be summarized as follows: Governmental ethics are a product of and can be understood only within the context of the moral climate of American life. Public ethics have steadily if not dramatically improved. The ethical standards of American public life are today markedly higher than the standards of yesterday; one item of proof is the widely felt outrage following recent disclosures which our grandfathers would have taken for granted. The ethics of public life are generally, and must continue to be, above the level of some practices tolerated in non-governmental activities (item: the bribe-giver seldom shares the odium or the punishment of the bribe-taker). There are comparatively few corrupt public officials in the United States; however, they manage not only to do considerable damage to the fabric of public policy but also to tarnish the reputation and prestige of the whole public service. Among the sinners, the bureaucrat is neither the most prominent nor the most frequent offender; there is also considerable ground for believing that the permanent bureaucracy has a record of ethics superior to that of the patronage staffs (although local police seem to supply the notable exception that proves the rule). The severest strictures of the observers are reserved for the legislators.

On causes and remedies there is basic agreement but considerable divergence in emphasis. The Senator sees violations of ethical standards as being concentrated in the "action-laden" areas of governmental activities; he would welcome a swing back toward a free market economy as one remedy, and he urges the development of codes of conduct and procedure as another important solution. The professor does not disagree, but he emphasizes as deeper causes certain habits and attitudes among the American people and persistent weaknesses in our political institutions. His prescription is a broad restatement of the goals which American political scientists have worked out over many years of study for the improvement of our methods of governance. These goals, which the Senator also endorses explicitly or implicitly, boil down in principle to ways of clarifying and sharpening the assignments of authority in our governmental system, of tightening the lines of responsibility in the executive hierarchy, of increasing the visibility of all those who make decisions and of the ways in which decisions are made, and of developing and using standards of good conduct in public life. These standards and their potentialities are a subject of recurrent preoccupation not only for the Senator and the professor but also for most of the witnesses before the subcommittee. Codes of ethics, whether fixed in statutes or in less formal terms, are seen as serving several purposes: providing new aspiration levels for public officials, providing the basis for sanctions and penalties against unethical practices, and introducing new certainties concerning proper conduct where ambiguities now flourish.

These volumes represent not the full diagnosis and solution but a promising beginning of the task of meeting the problem posed by Senator Douglas: "What could be tolerated when government was small cannot be endured when government is big. For its consequences, if not its causes, can be relatively worse."

Monetary Policy and the Management of the Public Debt. JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE ECONOMIC REPORT, SUBCOMMITTEE ON GENERAL CREDIT CONTROL AND DEBT MANAGEMENT. (82nd Congress, 2nd Session. 1952.)

(1) Replies to Questions and Other Material for the Use of the Subcommittee on General Credit Control and Debt Management. (Joint Committee Print, Parts 1 and 2.)

(2) Hearings Pursuant to Section 5(A) of Public Law 304 (79th Congress), March 10-31, 1952.

These volumes present the results of a congressional investigation into the conflict over monetary policy between the Secretary of the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board in late 1950. Representative Wright Patman's Subcommittee of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report, with the staff assistance of economist Henry C. Murphy, has elicited points of view and factual data from all official and nonofficial groups concerned. The Secretary of the Treasury, the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, and other less directly affected government agencies have been put on the record concerning their recommendations not only about the substantive content of monetary, credit and public debt policy but also about the process of, and organization for, policy formulation in this field. Questions directed to these officials included the extent of policy guidance from Congress, the powers of policy formulation in the executive branch, the ways of settling policy conflicts among governmental agencies, and recommendations for modifications in existing interagency relationships. The official replies to these questions are printed in the two volumes of the Joint Committee Print.

More valuable to political scientists because of the greater degree of attention focused on the process of policy formulation in this important aspect of national economic planning are the Hearings before the Subcommittee. The political scientists called to testify were Paul Appleby, James K. Pollock, Harold Stein and Lucius Wilmerding, Jr. Collectively they made a substantial contribution to the theory of political organization for economic planning.

The Subcommittee held several panel discussions. The one entitled "How should our monetary and debt management policy be determined?" produced extremely provocative theoretical discussions of policy development in the federal government. The participants in this panel were G. L. Bach, E. A. Goldenweiser, Jacob Viner, Harold Stein and Lucius Wilmerding.

The economists testifying unanimously supported an arrangement in which the central banking system should be a little outside of the regular policy-making process and have a degree of independence from the political pressures being exerted through the President and the Congress. In general, the economists start with their desired monetary policy, which they recognize is an unpopular policy in inflationary periods but which they regard as crucial for national welfare. Next they see our pressure group democracy bearing down on their sound policy. As a result they support organizational arrangements deemed to be conducive to the formation of "good" monetary policy. Dr. Goldenweiser stated this clearly on page 766 of the Hearings: "And so, I think that independence of the Federal Reserve . . . holds out the best promise of correct decisions in this very vital matter." The President and his Secretary of the Treasury are potential violators of the good policy of credit restrictions and stable money, because these public officials are under pressures from inflationary forces and because they face the great problem of managing the public debt. Moreover, Congress itself should be partially checked from interfering with monetary policy as worked out by the Federal Reserve Board. Again Dr. Goldenweiser expresses it clearly: "I would like to add . . . something that may be rude, but it ought to be in the record, and that is that Congress is an inflationary body because the groups in the population that are in favor of inflation are vastly better organized than many millions who suffer from inflation and are not organized, and I think that it is very wise for Congress to have a few hurdles between itself and direct influence on current credit policies" (Hearings, p. 776). Thus an independent agency staffed by and thinking along the lines of economists and bankers who possess the motivation for sound monetary policy is a helpful way to achieve the national interest. It is a way of aiding our democratic system to take unpleasant but necessary economic policies.

Political scientists Pollock and Appleby begin with the desirability of having policy conflicts settled by means of the hierarchy of the executive branch for the sake of unified responsibility. They see independent agencies like the Federal Reserve Board as clientele agencies with supporting clusters of special interests. Any policy-making agency should be brought under hierarchical controls so that at each successive level broader responsibility, knowledge and judgment can be brought to bear in behalf of more general public policy. Hierarchical controls provide a channel for general concern by relating conflicting policies to each other and moving toward general public policy. The independence of the Federal Reserve Board derogates from the hierarchical working out of public policy, and it should gradually be converted to a more responsible relationship to the Chief Executive. A central banking system must be integrated with larger governmental administrative machinery in order that its narrow, special point of view may be refined with broader considerations of national public policy with which monetary policy must be reconciled.

The economists and the political scientists, starting with different premises, make appropriate and logical deductions therefrom. There is no meeting point for their arguments.

However, one economist—George L. Bach—and one political scientist—Harold Stein—reveal in the hearings very similar analyses of the way to organize for the achievement of a monetary policy best adapted to the objectives of maximum employment and production for the nation. Both see advantage in having a separate agency which can contribute the greatest influence for a policy of economic and monetary stability and prosperity. A central banking agency to them has the advantage of being trusted to maintain monetary stability. Furthermore, it serves a valuable political function in that its decisions are accepted by bankers and other investors more readily than are the Treasury's.

These men see inflation control as one of the most difficult undertakings facing democratic government. The viewpoint that credit must be tightened in times of threatened inflation will not be adequately represented unless special arrangements are made. The Treasury is naturally impressed by the cost of the interest on the public debt, and the Congress and the President are under pressure from the demands of groups who desire easy credit. The problem, then, to which Mr. Bach and Mr. Stein turn is the design of an organization which will provide a built-in will to resist inflationary tendencies in the governmental process and will give this point of view as much influence as possible in the negotiation of public policy. In so doing they are not disturbed by the theoretical dilemma that, on the one hand, weighting the scales in favor of one point of view appears to violate the political equality of democracy, whereas eliminating the weighting threatens the economic results upon which democracy's survival is partially dependent. With refreshing realism, they admit (without saying it) that our whole governmental system is replete with built-in weightings and they do not even argue the rationale of adding another one. Furthermore, they imply (again without saying so) that a general theory of hierarchical control is not of great use in organizing for policy results in this field (or any other field). Organization is dependent on what policy influences one wishes to stress. The Hoover Commission's top-to-bottom hierarchical control blueprint does not suffice unless one is devoid of policy objectives, and these gentlemen are not.

Operating then on the principle that it is desirable to increase the influence and voice of the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board permanently in the process of policy development, they both propose that the independence of the Board be reduced so that its influence can be increased. Previously the Federal Reserve Board, they conclude, has not made its position sufficiently felt in federal negotiations on anti-inflationary policy. Its weakness in policy councils has been the result not of a lack of independence, but rather of too much independence. It is not true (as is commonly assumed) that a commission derives strength from its independence when it operates in an area in which other agencies have major responsibilities. Congress wanted "to impose on itself, and on the President, a kind of barrier, if you like, to too quick response to the electorate, to the way the wind blows today and tomorrow" (Bach, Hearings, p. 782). But Congress made an "overadjustment" to the problem. It set up an agency so independent that it is outside of policy negotiation and hence has been weak in its influence in general credit control and debt policy.

Messrs. Stein and Bach reach a high degree of agreement about the way to give the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board more influence with the President and Congress. They point out that as a pure matter of informal organization the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board has come to have in the last two years much more influence in policy formulation in the executive branch. This was first due to the assumption of the post of Chairman by Mr. William Martin, who was respected and trusted by both President Truman and Secretary of the Treasury Snyder. Under the Eisenhower Administration, the Treasury is largely staffed in its top echelon with men who accept the Reserve System's point of view or formerly worked in it.

What is needed is formal organization to make this Federal Reserve influence possible as a regular matter, namely, by means of closer working relations for the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board with the President's family of top financial advisers. The President would naturally have more confidence in him if he were designated to serve as Chairman at the pleasure of the President. Shorter terms for Board members would bring the President and the Board into closer relations. Finally, creation of a top-level monetary-fiscal advisory council in which the Federal Reserve Chairman sat would strengthen the voice of the Federal Reserve. As can be seen, these views are quite at variance with the traditional concept that the more independent an agency is from the political branches of government, the more influence it will have.

These gentlemen have then set forth an "operational theory" (although they do not say so) concerning the influence on public policy which different organizational relationships produce. It was derived by examining the relative weights of various groups in this particular area of policy making. When elaborated, this theory enabled them to penetrate beyond the overgeneralized theories about commissions deriving greater strength from greater independence, about independent commissions being closer to Congress than regular executive departments, and about the value of hierarchial controls as the solution of all policy problems and conflicts.

The similarity of the analyses of these two consultants from allied fields perhaps stems from the fact that each has probed the other's discipline. Abstraction of either "economics" or "politics" from the process of formation of public policy is apt to give distortions of viewpoint. The new area of the study of the development of public policy requires a bridging of the disciplinary lines. For this purpose a reading of the Hearings and the Joint Committee Print of the Subcommittee on General Credit Control and Debt Management is a rewarding experience.

Administration of National Economic Control. By EMMETTE S. REDFORD. (New York: The Macmillan Company. 1952. Pp. xvii, 403. $5.50.)

This solid, thoughtful book fills an important gap in the literature of government regulation of business. Its concern is not with issues of substantive public policy but with the administrative processes by which policy is formulated and elaborated and with the instruments and techniques through which it is refined and executed. Professor Redford has provided a comprehensive and unique inventory and synthesis of the kit of tools which has been developed in regulatory administration in recent decades.

While the major emphasis of the study is placed on mechanism and procedure, the political environment in which the regulatory bureaucracy functions is not neglected. One of the most suggestive chapters is devoted to an analysis of relations with interest groups and an exploration of ways in which "publicly-conditioned expertness" can guide and direct pressure politics toward a realization of "community purpose." Here, as elsewhere, the author reveals an awareness of the limits as well as of the potentialities of administrative initiative. His experience with the OPA during World War II has left a residue of lively respect for the obstructive capacities of pressure groups.

Insofar as this volume has a central thesis, it is that the major danger in the field of national economic control lies in the fragmentation and dispersal of regulatory authority rather than in the overweening arbitrary power of bureaucrats. "In our opinion," the author states, "the most serious present deficiency in the system of administrative control is the particularism of the administrative agencies and the claims made on their behalf for autonomy from overhead controls. . . . At the higher level of responsibility, where the President and Congress share authority, control over administration is weakened and dissipated. . . . The separation between the executive and Congress, the weakness of party controls within the Congress, the disintegration of the party system in the country, and the organization and persistence of functional and sectional interests, overextend the power of particularistic influences and weaken the ability of Congress and the President, acting together, to evaluate administrative performance and to use the legislative power as a means of giving new directives to administration."

Implicit in this analysis is a diagnosis of trends which the author never completely articulates but which nevertheless forms the basis of his argument. Put succinctly, it is that government unavoidably and necessarily plays an increasingly crucial role in the management and control of the economy and that this managerial responsibility cannot be efficiently discharged unless more effective means are found to coordinate and direct the autonomous islands of power in Congress and the executive establishment. This conviction leads the author to tilt a lance with the protagonists of the independent regulatory commissions and to advocate that Congress authorize the President to issue policy directives to the commissions in order to integrate their activities with those of other agencies subject to his control.

The author is not unaware of the factors which make for congressional reluctance to deposit such power in the presidency. But his sense of the dimensions and complexities of the problem of economic control impels him to consider the achievement of executive coordination as one of the most urgent items on the agenda of administrative reform. To those who see the role of government in less positive and promising terms and who view the plurality of action centers in administration as a safeguard against excessive concentration of political power, Professor Redford's argument will not be persuasive. On this issue, as in so many other debates on government organization, conflicting conceptions of proper structure grow out of fundamental differences of interest and political philosophy.

Whatever be the ultimate prospect for the strengthening of the President's directive power, the immediate likelihood that Professor Redford's suggestion will be adopted is not bright. Given the hard fact that power is dispersed in the autonomous principalities of the departments as well as in the independent commissions and the congressional committees, one would wish that the author had devoted more attention to the techniques of inter-agency and executive-legislative negotiation. The search for the creative compromise is not merely a negative virtue. It may represent the most fruitful approach to coordination. But this caveat aside, Professor Redford has written a valuable and informative book. The views with which he disagrees are stated with scrupulous fairness and demolished courteously and effectively. His own modest program of reform is carefully worked out and buttressed by evidence which will be difficult to refute. He has cut a new furrow in regulatory administration and brought together a wealth of material which all students in the field will eagerly welcome.

Problems of Nationalized Industry. EDITED BY WILLIAM A. ROBSON. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1952. Pp. 390. $5.00.)

This book, written by fourteen authors, deals penetratingly and authoritatively with the main issues of British socialization during the five year period, 1945-1950, when the Labour Government was putting through its major nationalization measures. In addition, Professor Robson contributes an essay formerly published in this REVIEW (June, 1950) dealing with the similarities and differences between British and French socialization during the same period. The book justifies its claim to its broad title by dealing topically, instead of programmatically, with subjects of universal interest, such as forms of organization, parliamentary control, and methods of judging efficiency. It achieves a new high as a unified, practical, and yet significantly theoretical contribution to the literature of public ownership. And it achieves what is usually so difficult in a symposium: a cohesiveness and completeness that is refreshing. The editor deserves credit for this result, which is doubtless also due in part to the fact that the book grew out of two previous publications: Public Enterprise, which Mr. Robson edited in 1937, and a special issue of the Political Quarterly, which appeared in 1950. However, of the fourteen essays found in the present publication, only six were included in the Political Quarterly-symposium; and since the method in Public Enterprise was programmatic, while in the present one it is functional, most of the present material is new.

Students of political science and economics on this side of the Atlantic can be thankful for the many studies that have recently appeared on various aspects of British nationalization. John Longhurst's Nationalisation in Practice (1950) was largely a case study of civil aviation, but in concluding chapters he dealt broadly with generic problems; Ernest Davies wrote National Enterprise in 1946 and D. N. Chester, The Nationalized Industries: An Analysis of the Statutory Provisions (revised edition) in 1951; the Acton Society Trust performed a monumental service in sponsoring a series of research papers, Nationalized Industry, in 1950-51; and Ben W. Lewis, sponsored by the Twentieth Century Fund, has recently (1952) published British Planning and Nationalization. The Robson volume differs from Lewis' treatment in that it does not include planning; it gives more emphasis to the governmental aspect and to evaluation; and the outline is topical rather than programmatic.

Problems of Nationalized Industry is divided into two parts. In the first, consisting of 14 chapters, the subjects dealt with are the public corporation in Great Britain, compensation in the nationalized industries, the governing boards of public corporations, ministerial control and parliamentary responsibility, labor and staff problems under nationalization, and nationalized industries in Britain and France. The respective authors form a balanced team, having been recruited from Parliament, ministerial offices, chairs of political science and economics, and the nationalized industries themselves. Most of them, like G. D. H. Cole, Sir Arthur Salter, and Ernest Davies, are already well known for their scholarship and administrative accomplishments.

The second part of the book, consisting of almost 100 pages, is the editor's own analysis and evaluation. He examines all of the subjects that have previously been considered, in order to draw all of the threads together, integrate them, and try to indicate what tendencies and problems are likely to be important in the future. This he does with considerable skill and insight, taking pains to point out that most of the subjects dealt with are controversial and that full agreement on all of them cannot be expected. This last point is brought sharply to focus in Sir Arthur Salter's essay entitled, "The Crux of Nationalization," where he takes a generally dim view of Britain's readiness, even now, for experiments in nationalization as extensive as those described in this book.

If in the following I emphasize the highlights of the Robson evaluation more than the excellent chapters contributed by others, it is only because the editor's thesis is brought together in one place and hence lends itself more readily to summarization. The public utility stage of British economic development is over, the country is now in the nationalization era, and real socialization lies ahead. Socialization, interestingly discussed on pp. 346-348, involves "a genuine spirit of democracy." Professor Robson believes that "the outlook for Britain's nationalized industries is generally favourable" and he says on the concluding page that nationalization "has sprung from a great popular revolt against the ethics, the incentives, and the results of capitalist enterprise." I gather, however, that Sir Arthur Salter, and possibly other contributors, would not subscribe to so sweeping a statement. Percentages, says Professor Robson, do not give a true index of changes in the business-government relationship that have taken place. It is not enough to state that one-fifth to one-fourth of the economy has been nationalized and that one person out of four is in public employment. These are the key industries. And it is the spirit and motivation, more than the structure and the administrative method, that have been changed.

Professor Robson makes it clear, however, that a study of nationalization is essentially a study of the public corporation. Prior to 1945, only broadcasting was nationalized in the sense herein described. Since then, large, nation-wide monopolies have been created for electricity and gas, transportation, banking (central, not commercial), coal mining, and in other fields. The local governments, which previously owned two-thirds of electricity supply and rather more than a third of the gas industry, have now been divested of their properties and nineteenth-century municipal socialism of the Joseph Chamberlain variety is passé. The compensation of former owners, private as well as governmental, has been fair or more than fair. The corporate board is the hub of policy and administrative matters. Syndicalism has lost ground. Parliamentary control over public corporations increased under the Labour Government, but not so much as to interfere with corporate autonomy. Public relations is now considered so important that it has been accorded formal departmentation and the public is sometimes critical because the function is emphasized too much.

Among the problems on which further, intensive research is needed, the following stand out: First, as Professor Robson is the first to agree, more reliable and possibly more imaginative methods must be invented for judging the efficiency of enterprises, although I must admit considerable skepticism about the possibility, as suggested, of having a single commission created for this purpose. Second, pricing policies and financial policies generally appear to be in need of careful scrutiny. Third, and in many ways the most important and baffling problem of all, nationalization has brought about so much centralization and accompanying bureaucracy that management problems put the British administrative tradition, which fortunately is one of the best, to a severe test. Growing out of this development, and fourth, is the effect on local government generally, about which Professor Robson expresses serious concern. Fifth is the problem underscored in Sir Arthur Salter's essay, the effect of nationalization on Britain's overseas trade and her general competitive situation. A sixth problem is that of adequate technical and scientific research to support the nationalized industries, a difficulty which the author of an excellent chapter on that subject makes clear is far from being adequately solved. A seventh area involves the relation of claimant groups, and especially labor and consumers, to the nationalized industries, for doubt may arise, and in some cases has arisen, as to whether management can continue to be an impartial "broker of influence." And, finally, there is the whole problem of planning and policy and the relation of Parliament and the Government of the day to the powerful public corporations which are now the British analogues to the American Telephone and Telegraph Company.

The authors of Problems of Nationalized Industries make it clear that Britain may be grateful for a series of studies dealing with the public corporation going back to Herbert Morrison's Specialization and Transport in 1933. The intensities of some problems are greater than could be foretold, and a few unanticipated ones have cropped out, but the basic ones such as concentration, monopoly, bureaucracy, and human relations are inherent in technological culture, our own no less than the British or the French.

Politics, Presidents, and Coattails. BY MALCOLM MOOS. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press. 1952. Pp. xxi, 237. $4.00.)

Malcolm Moos has added a useful volume to the still small but gradually growing number of factual studies in American political behavior. Politics, Presidents, and Coattails is a study in congressional elections with special emphasis on the interaction of congressional and presidential elections. The main body of statistical material relates to the seven congressional and three presidential elections, by districts, for the period 1938 to 1950. An appendix gives the voting percentages by districts for congressmen and president, and also the percentages for the senatorial elections.

In the first chapter Moos deals with presidential-congressional voting and makes the point that since World War I presidential candidates have received on the average about 12% more votes than the congressional candidates, compared with about 5% before 1916. The second chapter is a regional description of marginal districts—those where candidates receive 45% to 55% of the votes cast. The third chapter, on "Coattail Chasing," compares for a few selected districts the percentages of votes cast for Republican congressmen in the seven elections from 1938 to 1950 with those received by Republican presidential candidates in 1940, 1944 and 1948. The last two chapters deal with the "Politics of Electoral Leadership" and "Congressional Elections and the Politics of Tomorrow."

The statistical part of this study is on the "Coattails." Moos concludes that "Presidential Coattails, apart from the tides of their parties, do not boost significant numbers of congressional candidates into office." He finds 115 marginal districts (60 Republican and 45 Democratic), and only 42 critical districts (25 Republican and 17 Democratic), where the voting range is from 48.5% to 51.5%. Were he writing today, he would undoubtedly add that the difference between Truman's coattails of 1948 when 262 Democratic congressmen were elected and Eisenhower's coattails when 222 Republican congressmen were elected is only about 10% of the total number of seats in the lower house. My own studies show that on the average the difference between party strength in Congress in presidential election years and in mid-term years is the equivalent of only about 25 to 30 seats—about 7% of the total membership.

Nevertheless, the coattail problem is more important than Moos thinks. He tends to emphasize the vote received by the presidential candidate and by the congressional candidate in the same election. This may be a good measure of relative popularity. What is more instructive and significant is the contrast between the vote received by congressional candidates when no presidential candidate is in the field and when there is one. This is a more direct measure of the pulling power of the presidential coattails. Moos's tables, fortunately, give the names of the congressional candidates as well as their percentages, which should facilitate studies in the popularity of particular candidates over several elections with and without benefit of presidential coattails.

Moos recognizes but does not develop the real significance of elections with and without presidential coattails, i.e., the difference between party results in presidential and mid-term election years that may spell trouble for the party in power. I need only cite the Democratic losses in 1938, 1942 and 1950 and point to the troubles the Roosevelt and Truman administrations had because mid-term apathy cut down their working margin and therefore party legislative effectiveness in Congress. The fact that more than a third of the voters are unfamiliar with their congressmen and by not voting cut down the strength of the party in power in mid-term election years is to me the real coattail problem.

In the last chapter Moos deals with the great sectional differences that make for diversity in congressional policy and for conflict between the executive and legislative branches of our government. He presents the various views and proposals for improving our political structure. But he concludes that "our system of congressional elections, conducted though it is astride the contradictions and incongruities of our major parties—has served us well,” and that “out of the healthy interaction of presidential leadership and congressional attitudes comes the gradualist tempo of change in public policy that has served us well.” Moos does not define what he means by “well.”

It is unfortunate that this book was not scheduled for publication six months later than it was. We would have had the benefit of Moos's views on how the 1952 election results fit into his statistical analyses and political judgments.

One of the challenging problems in the field of local government is subjected to detailed study and analysis in a series of sixteen monographs under the general title Metropolitan Los Angeles: A Study in Integration. The series will include, in addition to the monographs here reviewed, studies of law enforcement, health and sanitation, fire protection, highways, water supply, parks and recreation, libraries, finance and taxation, and intergovernmental relations, with a concluding volume entitled The Metropolis: Is Integration Possible? Characteristics of the Metropolis and How the Cities Grew serve as basic studies which lay the foundation for the other fourteen monographs. One-third of Characteristics of the Metropolis is devoted to what has been done in twelve American and three foreign cities towards integration. With this background of experience elsewhere, the physical, social, economic and political picture in the Los Angeles region is presented, and comprehensive proposals thus far made for governmental integration in the region are discussed. The problem and the challenge are clearly presented. One gets the feeling that something needs to be done; the remedy is left to the studies which follow in the series. In How the Cities Grew we have a detailed historical analysis of how the situation developed, when new cities were incorporated and why, annexation and consolidation experience, and the record of disincorporation. The authors reject, or at least qualify, the standard of efficiency and economy as the test for solving the metropolitan area problem. They question the wisdom of the Virginia plan of placing decisions as to annexation in the courts since this tends to deny the doctrine of home rule. They believe that if a city grows too large in physical size and population there is a loss of sense of community, and they prefer a "confused but healthy pattern of local government than a simple and efficient but impersonal and regimenting metropolitan-wide bureaucracy." This is carrying the principle of local self-determination further than many persons would accept. The authors do recognize the desirability of basing administration on a larger area and would accomplish this by greater use of intergovernmental contracts or joint boards for administration of municipal services.

Regional Planning sets forth, on the basis of the experience in Los Angeles, the obstacles that must be overcome before any complete coordination of planning in a metropolitan region can be attained. Since the City of Los Angeles comprises only 11 per cent of the total county area but furnishes 55 per cent of the property tax base for Los Angeles County, the taxpayers of the city object to the county's furnishing urban-planning services to the unincorporated areas and smaller cities at the expense of the City of Los Angeles. The difficult task facing a regional planning agency which serves merely as a means of coordination of the activities of many local governmental agencies is shown in the Los Angeles experience. The variation from other metropolitan areas is one of degree rather than of kind.

The results of cooperative efforts by local governments in the Los Angeles area in the field of personnel administration are reported in Personnel Management. It is both an interesting and encouraging story, showing how much can be accomplished by cooperative effort to reduce the duplication, the conflicts and the lack of economy in public personnel administration resulting from many separate governments operating in the same area. Extensive use is made of intergovernmental contracts—between local governments, and between local governments and the state—where personnel services are handled by one government for another on a contractual basis. The City of Los Angeles, Los Angeles County, and the Los Angeles Board of Education cooperate in testing candidates for certain positions and in other aspects of personnel administration. While some suggestions are made for further cooperative action, the study deals primarily with what has been done.

In Governmental Purchasing it is shown that only limited progress has been made in cooperative purchasing by local governments in the Los Angeles region; a chapter on "Co-operative Purchasing Outside the Los Angeles Area" is more encouraging. The authors believe that "some form of functional coordination in governmental procurement is imperative" in metropolitan areas and recommend steps in this direction in Los Angeles. The report on Schools will be of limited interest to persons outside the Los Angeles area.

A detailed study of metropolitan government in one community, as contrasted with a comparative study in many areas, may not only disclose what is wrong and what needs to be done in the region studied, but may also result in conclusions of general applicability. Metropolitan Los Angeles has the improvement of conditions in Los Angeles as its principal goal. The findings and the conclusions will, however, be of general interest and value, and all persons interested in metropolitan government will be grateful for this study.

Psychoanalysis and Politics: A Contribution to the Psychology of Politics and Morals. BY R. E. MONEY-KYRLE. (New York: W. W. Norton and Company. 1951. Pp. 183. $3.00.)

With sharp intellectual and literary discipline, the author of this solid little book succeeds admirably in accomplishing the purpose specified in the subtitle. Insofar as the quality of thought is concerned, the content remains constructively provocative throughout, though some of the conclusions reached are highly debatable. Despite the incomplete development of some ideas and the unsatisfactory documentation of others, the author sets forth his views directly and clearly, without the cumbersome and self-conscious apparatus of scholarship which our American profession seems increasingly to affect; moreover, this is accomplished without the extremes in overgeneralization and subjective judgment which occasionally characterize British books.

In certain specifics, the book is a series of reflections on the author's experience as a member of the German Personnel Research Branch of the Control Commission created at the end of the war and concerned with two aims: a social survey and the selection of "suitable Germans" as leaders for a democratic society. More broadly, however, it involves the application of a generalized synthesis of psychoanalytic theory to the roots of certain political phenomena. In this latter aspect, the contents provide a fruitful basis for comparison and contrast with similar efforts, particularly those by Franz Alexander and Harold Lasswell.

The formal organization follows two closely related paths of development: first, the establishment of "A Theoretical Basis for a Psychological Approach to Politics"; second, an examination of "Some Aspects of the Psychology of Politics" with chief reference to inter-group relations, group-individual relations, and the state as an influence upon the development of moral character. Perhaps the most interesting and central feature of the book from the political science viewpoint is this latter topic, for the author produces a universal, systematic and functional definition of both the "good state" and "normal character," and then seeks to defend them on entirely empirical grounds. This attempt is but one illustration of the plain implication throughout the book that the "moral relativism" which has so largely characterized social science in this century is a doctrine of diminishing returns and that its utility has been largely, if not entirely, exhausted.

The numerous points at which functional definitions of "authoritarian" personal and social character are developed in contrast to "humanist" tendencies should be of special interest to those pursuing the lines of inquiry pioneered by Kurt Lewin, Ronald Lippitt, and others. The contents are also useful in comparison with such current studies as the supervision projects under Likert at Michigan and others elsewhere.

In his German personnel studies, the author found that the two conscience types which he defines—humanist and authoritarian—correlated both with home and occupational types. In the later consideration of group-individual relations, a detailed comparison of German "authoritarian" and English "humanist" movements broadens the above conclusion by providing "clear evidence of a causal link between two types of state and two types of character. In both, a change in the nature of the state, either towards the authoritarian or the humanist end of the scale, tended to be reproduced in the home and school, and so favoured the development of a character that modified the concept of the state still further in the same direction" (p. 122).

The "good state" defined by the author embodies "a high degree of freedom, a wide choice of creative sublimation, and the sympathetic, rather than mechanical, provision of security and welfare" (p. 137). The author claims no originality for this concept, beyond asserting that it "has been arrived at by new arguments that, perhaps for the first time, permit it to be defended empirically" (p. 137). Considerable stress is placed, however, on the point that psychoanalysis provides no magic formula for resolving political tensions, for the approach "presupposes that they [authoritarians] are at least prepared to listen" (p. 178).

The concept of "normality" in individual character is summarized as the integration of a person "whose mind has nothing permanently hidden from itself, and who is rational in the sense that the belief-systems governing his behavior are true within the range of his experience because they have been consciously tested" (p. 44). This is said to be "the kind of standard needed if we are to get beyond the relativist position in either politics or morals" (p. 45). The ultimate problem arising in the development of Money-Kyrle's arguments is, of course, the definition of "truth." Much depends on whether the reader accepts the "reality test" and the "test of consistency" (p. 40) as valid and adequate.

A most interesting line of inquiry in regard to party politics may be derived from the observation that "without the paranoid disturbances in thought produced by the mechanisms of splitting and projection, the party system as we know it would not itself be possible. Differences of opinion and differences of loyalty would of course remain to divide us into parties. But since each new issue would produce a new alignment, the parties would not stay the same" (p. 163).

Three points in the book are particularly questionable, notably the unqualified assertion that "political activity is designed to make widespread changes in the structure of society and of the state" (p. 123). Obviously, it may as often be devoted to the preservation of existing conditions. Secondly, the repeated equation of consciousness with insight and the asserted automaticity with which such equation occurs is not adequately supported. The comments on prejudice (pp. 27 ff.) are especially subject to this fault. Thirdly, in the correlation of authoritarianism and political immaturity (p. 135), the author fails to account for the fact that in the long course of history mankind has attained what freedom exists despite authoritarian systems.

International Political Science Abstracts (with alternate title: Documentation Politique Internationale). BY THE INTERNATIONAL POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION AND THE INTERNATIONAL STUDIES CONFERENCE. (Paris: UNESCO. Distributor in the U.S.A.: Columbia University Press, N. Y. $4.00 per year.)

Since the untimely demise in 1932 of the short-lived Social Science Abstracts political scientists have lacked an important tool of teaching and research. Within the United States the deficiency has been somewhat ameliorated by reason of the large number and comprehensive bibliographical coverage of our domestic professional journals. Even so, none of them pretends to anything approaching systematic analysis or even notation of all significant foreign material, especially that appearing in periodical publications. The initiative of the International Political Science Association, with the collaboration of the International Studies Conference and the financial underwriting of UNESCO, in establishing the International Political Science Abstracts as a quarterly review of world-wide coverage of the significant periodical literature in the field of political science, goes a long way toward correcting this deficiency.

Six issues of the quarterly have appeared to date, abstracting on a selective basis the literature of the field which has been published since the beginning of 1950. Volume I, which attempted the ambitious task of abstracting the literature of 1950 as well as the first nine months of 1951, contains summaries of 1447 articles, which appeared in 84 different periodicals. As a matter of policy, all articles in ten leading political science journals were abstracted, while selections were made from 74 other periodicals. Of the ten journals completely abstracted six were of American publication. Of the 74 selectively abstracted 14 were of American publication. However, the Abstracts even go behind the Curtain, with items from Voprosi Filosofii and Sovetskoe Gosudarstvo i Pravo from Moscow, Sprawy miedzynarodowe and Państwo i Prawo from Warsaw, and Társadalmi Szemle from Budapest. The two issues of Volume II which have appeared to date cover the fourth quarter of 1951 and the first quarter of 1952. They contain digests of 683 articles which appeared in 97 periodical publications, of which ten, as in the previous volume, were completely abstracted.

The quarterly is published in French and English. In the first two volumes, articles of French or English origin were abstracted in the language other than that of origin, while articles in all other languages were abstracted in the language chosen by the writer of the abstract. Beginning in 1953, however, all articles appearing originally in English will be abstracted in English, and all articles appearing originally in other languages will be abstracted in French. Each number is comprehensively indexed in English as well as in French, and a cumulative annual index is provided in the final number of each volume.

There is inevitable variation in the standards of the abstracts, but in the main they appear to be of an extremely high order of reportorial conciseness. It is, of course, possible to quarrel with the conceptual structure within which the editorial policy was erected, and even to question the validity, especially at the international level, of abstracts in a field less comprehensive than the totality of the social sciences. But when all the criticisms and comments have been made, there remains the monumental and imaginative achievement of the editors of International Political Science Abstracts in planning and executing a veritable tour de force in behalf of better teaching and research and closer international professional relations—all on a shoestring. The profession has ample reason for profound gratitude to the editorial board—Jean Meynaud, Saul Rose (recently succeeded by H. R. G. Greaves), and Bruce L. Smith—and especially to Jean Meyriat, the managing editor, as well as to the International Political Science Association and to UNESCO, for a significant contribution to the improvement of the tools of our trade.

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Primary Elections in the South: A Study in Uniparty Politics. By CORTES A. M. EWING. (Oklahoma: The University of Oklahoma Press. 1953. Pp. xii, 112. $2.75.)

This statistical study of southern primaries is based on the returns of 3,843 primary elections in eleven southern states between 1900 and 1948. These returns are processed into 36 tables in order "to determine . . . whether the intra-party struggle produces results that are at variance with the demands of democratic procedure."

Ewing varies the usual definition of the southern states by substituting Oklahoma for Virginia. Although the 3,843 primary returns do not comprise a complete collection of all primaries in the last half-century, anyone who has attempted to collect primary returns will realize that accumulating that many is a remarkable feat. Included are Democratic state, district, and local races plus a handful of Republican primaries.

The author examines the number of candidates who enter the primaries, the number of unopposed nominations, the advantages enjoyed by the incumbents, the closeness of the races, the variation in voter interest among offices, the frequency of runoffs, and the relation of top place in the first primary to victory in the runoff. In treating each subject the analysis covers the variations among states, among types of office (legislative, executive), among levels of government (local, district, statewide offices), and between the single- and the double-primary systems. Among his more important findings are that 40% of all nominations are unopposed; that incumbents, who are involved in three-fourths of all races, are virtually impossible to beat in non-local races; that most races are won by lopsided margins; and that in the double-primary system 84% of nominations are settled in the first primary. The last chapter, dealing with participation, has a somewhat different statistical basis and offers less new material.

The author's interpretations of his findings are not always as convincing as the basic statistical findings. No one will quarrel with the IBM machine's conclusions as to the average number of Democratic candidates for governor in each state. Yet when the author gives his explanation of why the average number is 7.38 in one state and only 3.56 in another, he resorts sometimes to broad generalizations about southern politics. Most of these generalizations coincide with my own prejudices, yet they are unsupported by arguments that would convince a skeptic.

The study attempts no startlingly new interpretation of southern politics. However, it gives us much new and detailed information on the workings of the Democratic primary and provides statistical proof that a one-party system is a feeble mechanism for democracy.—DONALD S. STRONG, University of Alabama.

Soil Conservation Districts in Action. By ROBERT W. PARKS. (Ames, Iowa: The Iowa State College Press. 1952. Pp. xi, 242. $3.50.)

The American people have come to realize the complexity as well as the importance of their conservation job. Recognition of the need for action to preserve the nation's soils has been followed by realization that the matter cannot be left entirely to the whim of the individual farmer. Governmental guidance, persuasion, and assistance are required, but no one level of government is equipped to do the job singlehandedly. A pooling of the peculiar competencies, energies, and resources of each level is indicated. Out of these conditions and needs, Professor Parks points out, grew the concept of the soil conservation district and an attempt to secure through it a new working arrangement which could merge in its operating process the values of both national and state programming and local democratic determination.

Over 2,400 districts have been established, and the number is growing. Some twelve thousand farmers now act as district supervisors—governors of their districts. Professor Parks records with competent scholarship and with objectivity the results of his six years of study and observation of the districts in operation. The district is analyzed and appraised as a governmental arrangement which has taken precedence over national, state, and county government as the administrative device for assisting farmers in getting conservation on the land. The critical question identified and considered by the author is: "Has the district so met the two large tests of effectiveness and democracy that its creation in addition to the traditional units of government has been justified?" The conclusion set out in an excellent final chapter on the future of the districts is hopeful but cautious: "The soil conservation district has not yet been sufficiently weathered by time for its value in future agricultural administration to be projected. Thus far, however, the district has demonstrated promising potentialities in developing a new working integration between national and local government as well as between the lay citizen and his government."

Soil Conservation Districts in Action should be widely read by participants in the affairs of these new units of local government, by others concerned with problems of agriculture and conservation, and generally by students of government and administration. The book will reassure those who fear that the federal government through its agricultural agencies has gained too much control over the farmers of America. Legal coercion and administrative standards have been less important in the affairs of the districts than the persuasiveness of the technical personnel of the Soil Conservation Service, skilled in both conservation and human relations, and working with supervisors and farmers. The significant information on operating relationships which Professor Parks presents deserves a great deal of consideration as methods and machinery for administering agricultural programs are restudied.—LAWRENCE L. DURISON, Tennessee Valley Authority.

Civic Victories. By RICHARD S. CHILDS. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1952. Pp. xvii, 350. $3.50.)

It must be recorded that the most remarkable thing about this volume is the insight it gives about its author. For Richard S. Childs is the grand man of all local government reform in the United States. And this is the story of reform at the grass roots—its philosophy, the evils needing remedy, its proposed cures, its success—as Richard S. Childs sees it. Civic Victories will undoubtedly serve as an inspiration to those who are working the fields of reform; but to the systematic political scientist its most valuable function is that it reveals something of the nature of the reasoning, the scope of activity, and the vitality, conviction, and emotion of the reformer.

Most of the philosophy, evils, remedies, and successes will be quite familiar to political scientists, although at a number of points Mr. Childs presents reasoning or facts that are refreshingly new. The author is given to making sweeping generalizations about human nature and behavior which go largely unproved and sometimes seem to be 100 per cent correct and at other times 100 per cent wrong. Thus we read (p. xiv), "Human nature being much the same everywhere. . . ." This assumption about the uniformity of human nature leads him into several curious statements. After reviewing Cincinnati's fight for better government he says: "The governmental mechanism changed, but Cincinnatians remained the same people before and after!" (p. 4). Is this really true? Most reformers seem to feel that it is, but they do themselves an injustice in making this point because one of the most salutary effects of a successful reform movement is the change in human behavior that takes place in the process. The local citizens behave in a different manner than formerly—their motivations, their values, their responses are all likely to change. This may not be altering human "nature," but it comes very close to doing it. Along the same line of thought, the author (p. 79) apparently believes that our parties can be made to function much like the English parties if only we simplify governmental structure. Logical enough if human nature is everywhere the same. Consistent with the idea that human nature is uniform is the contention that partisan politics tends to follow the pattern of the most notorious bosses and machines of the large cities such as New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia. This is difficult to accept, and it is to be regretted that Mr. Childs did not spend more of his life outside the confining atmosphere of New York politics.

While the argument pursued is not always consistent, while adequate proof is often lacking, and while the book is poorly organized and the style somewhat awkward, Civic Victories remains an important and worth-while volume. It is the best statement of local reform politics to date, and it will be an invaluable guide to reformers as well as an instructive case study for the scientist. The breadth of political understanding of the author, who has been employed in business most of his life, as well as the extent of his activity in behalf of reform, will be something that no reader will soon forget.—EDWARD W. WEIDNER, Michigan State College.

Gentlemen Freeholders: Political Practices in Washington's Virginia. BY CHARLES S. SYDOR. (Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press. 1952. Pp. ix, 180. $3.50.)

Gentlemen Freeholders is a comprehensive, scholarly, and well-written portrayal of the organization and operation of practical politics in Virginia during the last half of the eighteenth century, a period which saw the transition from colonial to state and national politics and during which the Virginia political system underwent little change and produced more than its share of outstanding political leaders. The whole political and elective process is described: the leadership of the gentry in the county oligarchies, the role of the ordinary voter, the conduct and control of elections, and the operation of the system in the House of Burgesses. Prominent political personages are frequently mentioned. A unique blending of aristocratic and democratic elements and a quasi-federalism characterized the system, and these, the author feels, had an effect upon the original nature and spirit of our federal constitution.—O. DOUGLAS WEEKS, University of Texas.

Appointed Executive Local Government: The California Experience. BY JOHN C. BOLLENS. (Los Angeles: Haynes Foundation. 1952. Pp. xi, 233. Paper: $3.00; Cloth: $3.75.)

A study of California city and county experience with appointive chief administrators, which directs attention to the manager plan and the chief administrative officer plan. Extensive data are presented in a variety of ways, including several brief case reports.

How Human Rights Got Into the Constitution. BY ZECHARIAH CHAFEE, JR. (Boston:

Boston University Press. 1952. Pp. ix, 81. $2.50.)

Three lectures in which the inquiry moves backward, first to "The American Background," then to "The English Background," and finally to the special story, told inspirationally, of the English background of "The Most Important Human Right in the Constitution"—Habeas Corpus.

Frontiers for Freedom. EDITED BY R. GORDON HOXIE. (Denver: The University of Denver Press. 1952. Pp. xi, 327. $3.75.)

A representative collection of papers, presented at a symposium marking the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Social Science Foundation of the University of Denver, exploring prospects for meeting basic issues of freedom on various challenging frontiers of human development.

Conduct of Judges and Lawyers: A Study of Professional Ethics, Discipline and Disbarment. BY ORIE L. PHILLIPS AND PHILBRICK MCCOY. (Los Angeles: Parker and Company. 1952. Pp. xxvii, 247.)

Some years ago the American Bar Association undertook the sponsorship of a project which came to be known as The Survey of the Legal Profession. This book is one of the reports which have resulted from this undertaking. The report is confined to a study of professional ethics, discipline and disbarment based upon a survey of the practices now in operation in the United States. The conclusions reached are that there is a need for the restatement of professional ethics, a tightening up of disciplinary procedures, and an improvement in relations between the bar and the citizenry.

NOTE ON AMERICAN GOVERNMENT TEXTBOOKS

Since January, 1950 some thirty books have been published expressly for use in American government courses. With greatly expanded student enrollment and growing interest in government, beginning courses—most often courses in American government—have offered a lucrative market. Coincidentally, increasing discussion of teaching goals and methods has stimulated in many a desire to produce a textbook with a "new approach." Thus the college teacher faces an unprecedented range of choice in selecting a text for his beginning course.

One of the complicating problems in making this selection is that for many of this greatly expanded and expanding body of students, professional requirements so fill their class schedules that this one course will be their sole college contact with political science. Hence for the greater number of participants the course is regularly both introductory and terminal. How the needs of this body of students are to be reconciled with the needs of the smaller number who take the course as the first of many in the field is a question that has not yet been resolved to the satisfaction of anyone, though many authors have been willing to make the attempt with their proffered publications.

Political scientists frequently say they are training their students for "citizenship," and usually preface the term with the adjective "good." This objective is rather fully discussed in Chapters II and VII of Goals for Political Science (1951), the Report of the American Political Science Association Committee for the Advancement of Teaching. This survey indicated that the most friendly disputants fail to agree on what subject matter should be included or excluded in citizenship education. One group, in trying to reach some conclusions on course content, presents the point of view that the beginning course in American government should train young people for active participation in political party affairs and procedures. Thomas H. and Doris D. Reed have ably and vigorously sustained this contention in two publications recently issued by the Citizenship Clearing House of New York. The first, Evaluation of Citizenship Training and Incentive in American Colleges and Universities, appeared in 1950, and the second, Preparing College Men and Women for Politics, in 1952.

This approach has met with a good deal of criticism. Participation does not necessarily lead to understanding, and action without understanding may have disastrous consequences. There is no question as to the ease with which action may be started. Millions of deluded Germans actively participated in the politics fostered by Hitler, Goering, Goebbels, et al., seemingly without any comprehension or understanding of what it all meant. The tragic consequences of that active and strenuous "participation" in politics without understanding have not yet run their course. Evidently something more is needed.

Teachers of political science have attempted to furnish this necessary "something more" through courses which give background and understanding to the student. Once the student has learned the nature of the problems which have been present in times of crisis in the past and how they have been solved, current difficulties which bring the old problems up again in a new disguise no longer seem insuperable. It was study of this general nature which nurtured such eminent practitioners of the art of politics as James Madison and Thomas Jefferson.

In this broad context there have traditionally been used three general approaches to the teaching of American government. The older approach emphasized a factual presentation of the structure of the governmental system. The second is the functional approach, in which the functions exercised by government agencies are stressed, with federal, state, and local activities being shown in each functional area. A third emphasizes the concepts underlying the functions performed by government and de-emphasizes the presentation of detailed factual material.

In the structural approach, the usual procedure is to start off with the structure of the federal government, whose foundations were thoroughly laid in the Constitution, and then to proceed through most of the year at this level leaving only the last few class periods for a quick and cursory glance at local problems. It may be that a more vital approach would be to devote some time to principles and theories of political forms and then to apply them to the seeable, known, and understandable issues of local government. From that point it would be logical to progress to and through state problems, interstate relations, state-federal matters, and then to talk about the federal government and its operations. The terms concerning government as they would appear in this arrangement of subject matter might become intelligible to the student and the subject matter more vital. Since, however, such an approach would mean revising whole reams of lecture notes and the rewriting or writing of textbooks in a new manner, it is usually considered impractical.

In reviewing a textbook, or in using it, anyone can find errors; but in a majority of cases these are not really significant. What is important is the organization of the volume and the kind of presentation which the author has made of his material. In discussing these points a reviewer should not be pedantically critical and should keep in mind the differences in preferences among teachers. Some persons prefer one kind of presentation, some another. No cursory examination and no statement based upon it can give a true picture of any text; it must be used in class work before comment has complete validity; hence the frequent question of the value of reviews. Even when there is close affinity, the author and the user will rarely agree in all points. It is not meet then to condemn a text out of hand. Thus, when this reviewer reads the volume by Professors Carter and Rohlfing, he finds a greater emphasis upon business and economic activities and upon legal decisions than he likes, but understanding the value of this type of presentation to many teachers he can commend it to them on this ground. The purpose of a textbook is to stimulate thinking and to integrate materials, and here, as is so often true, "what is one man's meat is another man's poison."

Turning to the twenty or so texts prepared for American government courses which have appeared during the past three years, we find in the first group seven volumes using the traditional approach through a structural or institutional discussion of the national, state, and local governments, with from two-thirds to three-fourths of the space devoted to the federal government alone. The volumes tend to approach or exceed a thousand pages, and usually suffice as a text for a year course. Brief comments on each of the seven texts follow.

Introduction to American Government. BY FREDERIC A. OGG AND P. ORMAN RAY. (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts. 10th edition. 1951. Pp. viii, 1063. $5.50.)

This is the last revision of the famous production issued by Professor Ogg before his death. It is a monumental work, though strongly criticized by many because of its encyclopedic nature. It is a volume which has been used for years by teachers of American government as containing a mine of information and as a source to which they could turn for accurate information when they needed it in a hurry. It is an excellent volume to use as a springboard for subjective interpretations of the processes of government, since the student can always weigh the instructor's words against the accumulation of data in the text. This publication is also the epitome of careful scholarship constantly striving to check every point in order that it may be accurate and in the right context.

Essentials of American Government. BY FREDERIC A. OGG AND P. ORMAN RAY. (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts. 7th edition. 1952. Pp. x, 774. $5.00.)

This is a rewritten short form of the text above, designed for those who do not care for such a heavy dose of government as is offered in the larger volume. The book was entirely rewritten by Professor Ogg and had been completed, except for the proofreading, before his death. It is of the same high caliber as the text described above.

The American System of Government. BY JOHN H. FERGUSON AND DEAN E. McHENRY. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company. 2nd edition. 1950. Pp. xii, 1042. $5.00.)

This, like "Ogg and Ray," is completely traditional in its organization of material, but makes considerable use of charts and maps as illustrative matter. It is well written and covers the field of government structure. There are also film strips which are designed to accompany the text, and are available for use when the proper payment is proffered. They provide an interesting correlation of older lecture methods with newer audio-visual teaching aids prepared under the direction of the same individuals.

A Grammar of American Politics. BY WILFRED E. BINKLEY AND MALCOLM C. MOOS. (New York: Alfred A. Knopf. 2nd edition. Revised and enlarged. 1952. Pp. xix, 1059, xxiv. $6.00.)

The enlargement of this text results for the most part from tacking on a section on state and local government to make it conform in organization and length with the other standard texts. As in the first edition there has been a conscious attempt to make the writing more of a narration than an exposition. There is a particularly good section on pressure groups with an excellent transition to political parties. Though the style of writing is different this is a traditional textbook in approach and organization.

American Government, National, State and Local. BY CLAUDIUS O. JOHNSON. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell and Company. 1951. Pp. xx, 1068. $5.00.)

Here the reader finds a rewriting and rearrangement of Professor Johnson's Government in the United States, 5th edition, mentioned below. In his preface the author says that he dare not say that the students may read his text "with pleasure," but this reviewer believes that they might do just that. The style is interesting and there is a profusion of charts, graphs, and figures to lighten the presentation. The book is deliberately arranged in the traditional manner for purposes of competition, but the personality of the author stands out and the functional approach in his other works colors this excellent text.

Government and Politics in the United States.

BY HAROLD ZINK. (New York: The Macmillan Company. 3rd edition. 1951. Pp. x, 1008. $5.50.)

Professor Zink attempts to explain the structure of American government on the three levels in terms of the functions performed and their effects upon the citizens. The section on national administrative activities and that on citizenship and its responsibilities are especially good.

The American Government and Its Work. BY EDWARD W. CARTER AND CHARLES C. ROHLFING. (New York: The Macmillan Company. 1952. Pp. xv, 875. $6.00.)

This is based upon the older text, The New American Government and Its Work, by JAMES T. YOUNG, and in most respects is a new edition of that work. In this revision the organization is generally traditional, with some slight rearrangement in the federal section. Legal decisions are extensively used to illustrate the authors' points; and the relationship of government and business is heavily stressed, with a tendency toward a conservative interpretation on all such matters. There is considerable repetition in the organization, and too little stress is placed upon local government, which is discussed in one chapter only.

A second group of texts follows the traditional approach found in the series above, but limits the material to the federal government. The textbook may have been specially written for this form of presentation, but usually the federal government section is lifted bodily from a larger study and given a separate binding. This is particularly true of the first two listings below where no further comments are needed in addition to those made for the full volume.

Introduction to American Government, the National Government. BY FREDERIC A. OGG AND P. ORMAN RAY. (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts. 10th edition, 1951. Pp. 771. $5.00.)

The American Federal Government. BY JOHN H. FERGUSON AND DEAN E. MCHENRY. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company. 2nd edition. 1950. Pp. 816. $5.50.)

American National Government. BY CLAUDIUS O. JOHNSON. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company. 1951. 3rd edition. Pp. xix, 810. $4.25.)

Interestingly written, this third edition of Professor Johnson's text brings the material up to date, revises the organization to some extent and has a new chapter on "The Conduct of Foreign Relations." Charts and graphs are used to clarify points touched upon in the printed pages.

Principles and Problems of American National Government. BY JAMES M. SWARTHOUT AND ERNEST R. BARTLEY. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1951. Pp. xl, 700. $4.25.)

This text is organized in the traditional manner to a greater degree than usually found today. Only 135 pages of material on "line functions" of the government are included, a rather cursory treatment of a most important part of the government activity of the United States. This was deliberately planned because the authors wanted to explain the principles which underlie the American political system. The authors have done an excellent job in writing, presenting the material in an interesting style, and the product is a good example of the newer shorter form of text devised for classroom use.

American National Government. BY HAROLD R. BRUCE. (New York: Henry Holt and Company. 1952. Pp. xi, 836. $5.50.)

This is the only newly written study in this group, and marks Professor Bruce's first effort in this particular field. The writing is well done, and the organization is traditional. Every chapter is keyed with several standard collections of "readings," thus making it easier for the instructor and the student alike to find supplementary information. Good use is made of cartoons, graphs, maps, illustrations of ballots, and other aids. This increasing trend toward the use of visual-aid material seems to be a part of the trend toward "picture" books that is so evident in our culture today. A careful perusal of all the volumes noted will show that somewhat greater use of illustrations of all kinds can be discerned in the newer books as compared with those that were issued during the first year covered in this survey. This type of material livens up the appearance of the publication, and perhaps makes it more interesting to many students, but its real value may have to wait the test of time.

Somewhere between the two categories listed above comes a new presentation of American government on a very much simplified scale.

American Federal Government, A General View.

By HERMAN C. NIXON. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1952. Pp. x, 476. $4.00.)

Deliberately designed to give the essential outline of the material and yet permit the instructor to go out on his own paths, the use of the book shows that this concept has certain values. All three levels of government are treated from the usual outline, but with merely a nod given to the state and local levels. Here too, much use is made of visual-aid materials. For a one-semester course this text will meet with much favorable comment. For a backward class, it is the best volume in the field to get the material across.

A third category is composed of those texts which, for lack of a better term, can be called a "composite" type. Their approach has been called the functional one, but this is not fully descriptive. All of the books in this class are strongly traditional in that they cover the three levels of government, but the state and local discussions are merely tacked on to a full discussion of federal activities.

Our American Government, the Citizen's Approach. By HELEN MILLER BAILEY, EUGENE L. LAZARE, AND CONRAD H. HAWKINS. (New York: Longmans, Green and Co. 1951. Pp. ix, 566. $4.25.)

The three authors have obviously attempted to bridge the gap between the secondary school and the junior college, and have produced a book that is not quite satisfactory for the latter. It certainly is not of the caliber that is usually associated with college work. The style is lucid and one enjoys reading the chapters, but in so doing one gains the impression that the work is designedly "corny," if one may be permitted to use the language of the group for which the book is intended. The illustrations are in line with the age level of the proposed reader. The authors are to be commended for their effort to write a government text for younger readers, but the product should be retained there.

Government in the United States. By CLAUDIUS O. JOHNSON. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company. 5th edition. 1951. Pp. xviii, 1064. $5.00.)

In this fifth edition of an already widely known and used text Professor Johnson has continued the approach which he has formerly used. There is much use of illustrative material all through the text. It is interesting to note that the material is so arranged that the author was able to lift chapters, and sections of chapters, bodily from this volume, do a little rewriting in some cases, and then by reorganizing this collection of unattached writing produce the traditional "structural" volume commented on above. To this reviewer this rearrangement seems to prove that what is often acclaimed new and different may be merely a better and more effective method of presenting the old material. In this instance it makes little difference in what form the material is organized: the results are still interesting reading.

In connection with his texts, Prof. Johnson has prepared two pamphlets which are available from the publisher. The first is titled, Teaching Suggestions to Accompany Textbooks by Claudius O. Johnson. It contains some pertinent suggestions from a long-time teacher to newcomers in the profession. It also contains a few sample objective questions taken from the second pamphlet, whose title is Objective Tests to Accompany Textbooks by Claudius O. Johnson. This pamphlet contains 440 multiple-choice questions and an objective examination on the Constitution. Together these publications represent a worthwhile attempt on the part of an author to make his brainchildren more useful to teachers.

American Government in Action. By MARSHALL E. DIMOCK AND GLADYS O. DIMOCK. (New York: Rinehart & Company. Revised edition. 1951. Pp. xvi, 1004. $5.00.)

This interesting product of joint family authorship marks a decided break with the usual presentation. While it organizes the material in relatively the same sequence as any other text, it is deliberately designed to explain government from the functional approach. Its chapters have to stand on their own merits and cannot be rearranged into a traditional textbook. The reviewer's criticism here is that the state and local discussions are tacked on at the end of the federal material. It may be that this is an inherent difficulty that cannot be overcome, but it will be interesting to see if someone will be able to weave all the functions of all governments into a single narrative in such a manner that the reader may be led through the full story without having to adjust to the abrupt transitions that now mark the presentations. Visual-aid material appears throughout the pages of the Dimocks' text.

Closely related to the above group is the composite type of textbook which is concerned only with the national government. The production of each author varies markedly from the other volumes in this category, and the freshness of approach makes each one stand out by itself. These three attempts may well mark the beginning of a new trend in textbook writing, since they are in many ways traditional and yet make new paths plain.

American Democracy in Theory and Practice.

BY ROBERT K. CARR, DONALD H. MORRISON, MARVER H. BERNSTEIN, AND RICHARD C. SNYDER. (New York: Rinehart & Company. 1951. Pp. xiii, 1094. $5.00.)

The outstanding feature of this work is the treatment given to civil liberties and the rights of citizens in this nation. This might be expected because of the first author listed, and is a good illustration of the way in which an author's major interest can color his whole interpretation. Excellent bibliographical material is presented for each chapter, a matter of some importance both for the teacher and for the student.

The Theory and Practice of American National Government. BY CARL B. SWISHER. (Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company. 1951. Pp. viii, 949, xix. $5.00.)

Because of Professor Swisher's well known interest in legal matters it is somewhat surprising to find that the treatment of civil rights and the judiciary receive less space here than in many other texts. There is, however, much reliance upon legal decisions, and there are few of the leading cases in constitutional matters that are not cited at least in the footnotes. The material is well presented. The approach is one which should develop much interest, in that students are made to feel a relationship with what they read.

Government by the People; The Dynamics of American National Government. BY JAMES M. BURNS AND JACK W. PELTASON. (New York: Prentice-Hall. 1952. Pp. xvii, 946. $5.50.)

than this product of two newcomers to the field. The chapter headings are intriguing. Once in them, the chapters lead one on and on. That is probably the chief difficulty with using this book as a textbook. All the interesting materials are presented by the text. This leaves to the instructor the task of supplying the oftentimes dry, but necessary facts with which the student must be furnished if he is to understand what he reads. From the teacher's standpoint it is far better to have the textual material furnish the skeletal basis of a course. This permits the lecturer to direct his students into the most interesting and intriguing bypaths of the subject matter. Accordingly, a good many instructors may find Burns and Peltason a bit "thin" because they frequently interest the student and do not inform him.

A paper-covered brochure by the same authors, called Government by the People: The Dynamics of American State and Local Government, has recently appeared. It is a short printing of 158 pages, and will probably make its later appearance bound in at the back of the larger volume above. It is obviously an effort to meet requests for a coverage of American government through a more standard form of publication.

This review would not be complete unless some attention were paid to the several collections of "readings" which have appeared simultaneously as companion pieces for classroom texts. The "readings" more clearly even than the textbooks show the predilections of the authors, and one can almost watch the mind of the compiler work as the collection is studied. No two of these works are the same, and yet each to some extent follows the same basic pattern. Every one fills a need, and the only trouble is that it is impossible to use them all. There is of necessity some overlapping, but the remarkable thing is that the selections vary as much as they do, since they must relate to the same subject matter.

It is as time-saving devices that the "readings" appeal most to teachers. There is such a mass of good illustrative material in current periodicals, government reports, and literary offerings that most instructors become lost in the forest; hence the value of these collections. In an effort to assist students to find pertinent data for themselves and thereby gain the thrill of discovery a new type of supplementary volume has appeared.

A Guide to the Study of Public Affairs. By E. E. SCHATTSCHNEIDER, VICTOR JONES, AND STEPHEN K. BAILEY. (New York: William Sloane Associates. 1952. Pp. v, 135. $1.50.)

Government documents, court decisions, and directories are reproduced, together with newspaper clippings and facsimile headlines. On each there are to be found the penciled notations of explanation by the editors. Every illustration with its notations is an integral part of a discussion on "How to use ———." Together with explanations from the teacher this handy guide should make clear to every student what has too often been a mere collection of terms. It could prove to be the most important time-saver at the disposal of the instructor. The illustrations showing how to study the work of the real estate lobby, and the record of a congressman, are classics in themselves.

American Government; Basic Documents and Materials. By ROBERT G. DIXON AND ELMER PLISCHKE. (New York: D. Van Nostrand Company. 1950. Pp. xx, 420. $2.90.)

There is probably no record of the number of times any given teacher has said that he wished he could put his hands on that copy of a legal warrant, or other document, which he had been saving to use in class but which is out of the file. That complaint need not arise again, for here in a compact form is the answer to the problem of filing such illustrative displays. All that are needed are included, and when used to supplement any standard textbook no student need ever say he has never seen an example of a legal document. The inclusion of statistical charts and graphs adds to the coverage, since they are usually related to the official forms reproduced.

The five collections noted below follow the sequence of the traditional structural textbooks and each one presents a good series of excerpts.

Outside Readings in American Government. EDITED BY H. MALCOLM MACDONALD, WILFRED D. WEBB, EDWARD G. LEWIS, AND WILLIAM L. STRAUSS. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company. 2nd edition. 1952. Pp. x, 884. $2.95.)

In the revision of their excellent collection the collaborators have removed some illustrations which were out of date or otherwise not as acceptable as when first included, and have added newer ones of current significance. The editors are to be commended for using complete articles or chapters in most of the selections.

Readings in American National and State Government. By DAVID FELLMAN, LANE W. LANCASTER, AND A. C. BRECKENRIDGE. (New York: Rinehart & Co. 1950. Pp. xi, 399 and ix, 347. $2.40.)

There are more Supreme Court decisions here than in most collections of readings and this gives the student an approach he might not get otherwise. The selections are well chosen but the reviewer would have preferred shorter articles so that less excerpting would have been required.

Materials on American National Government. By JOHN M. SWARTHOUT AND ERNEST R. BARTLEY. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1952. Pp. xviii, 571. $2.95.)

Designed to be used with the textbook written by the same authors. The reviewer would have been better satisfied if there had been less use of short extracts which, while well chosen and meaningful, still leave the reader wondering what came next.

The People, Politics, and the Politician. By A. N. CHRISTENSEN AND EVRON M. KIRKPATRICK. (New York: Henry Holt and Company. Revised edition. 1951. Pp. xiv, 1042. Cloth $4.50, paper $3.25.)

While considered as supplementary material, this volume is almost a textbook in itself. It has been extensively revised in illustrations used, but remains as challenging as ever. It represents the work of two collaborators who have a flair for choosing the dramatic in presenting material representing their personal opinions. There are many excellent lengthy readings which give the student the point of view of the writer chosen. Since there are only 120 articles it is easily seen that the average length is well above the normal presentation.

Basic Issues of American Democracy. By HILLMAN M. BISHOP AND SAMUEL HENDEL. (New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts. Second edition. 1951. Pp. xiii, 449. $2.25.)

The collaborators have taken 32 topics, and arranged them in sections which follow the normal pattern of textbook organization. Each topic ordinarily includes two authors who are frequently antagonistic. This technique, plus the quality of the selections, excites students and elicits immediate reaction and discussion. In some instances, however, the selection suffers from lack of originality.

Two final volumes reflect a different approach. While both are labelled "problems" the Lane publication is an attempt to use cases in presenting the material, whereas the Riemer volume presents a pro and con argument followed in each case by leading questions.

Problems in American Government; An Introduction to Political Analysis. By ROBERT E. LANE. (New York: Prentice-Hall, 1952. Pp. viii, 373.)

Here is a disposable workbook. The pages are perforated for easy removal. Thirty-seven cases are posed by presentation of the material; there is an answer sheet to be filled out and a sheet for criticising "propositions for discussion." Presumably a case would be assigned, discussed and the answer sheets filled out and turned in for a grade. The cases are well chosen and give rise to varying interpretations. This reviewer does not like the use of answer sheets which by their form seem to imply that the correct answer can be given in a fixed number of words in a uniform blank area. If the answer sheets were being used only to help direct the student's analysis of the case and to marshal his answers much of the criticism would vanish. The workbook ought to be widely used to see if it is really a new technique for teaching or if particular men and the schools in which they teach are the major reason for the success which the case method has so far had.

Problems of American Government. By NEAL RIEMER. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1952. Pp. xi, 356. Cloth $3.75, paper $2.75.)

Professor Riemer has chosen seventeen problems for his contribution to supplementary texts. Each has a subject which is highly controversial and is guaranteed to cause disagreement even before the material is read. Problem 12, for example, is entitled, "Administration: Does Big Government Mean an Irresponsible, Tyrannical, and Wasteful Bureaucracy?" The selections from three authors and the ten leading questions which follow them will almost certainly bring forth an animated classroom discussion, which in turn will cause closer scrutiny of the textbook for more ammunition.

This discussion of textbooks for American government has not touched at all upon another long series which has appeared during the same calendar interval. These are the publications for use in courses covering state government, state and local government, local government, and municipal government. When these are added to the texts noted above, we have a total production that exceeds anything that has gone before. Perhaps the time has come to insist that no new book in this crowded field shall appear until it has been shown by a judgment of a jury of the profession to be sufficiently new in approach and notable in presentation to make a real contribution. While this might affect the publication rule for promotion of teachers, it would save much wear and tear on the teacher looking for some new way to approach a standard field.—ANDREW E. FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

France under the Fourth Republic. By FRANÇOIS GOGUEL. (Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press. 1952. Pp. xiii, 198. $3.00.)

This book is the third of a series on postwar problems of France and Italy undertaken at Cornell University. Written by one of the best French political scientists, it is a useful addition to the growing literature on postwar France. The title of the book is misleading since more space is given to the electoral reform and the election of 1951 than to the whole history of the past five years of the Republic.

A stimulating last chapter on the "fundamental problems of French political life" attempts to redress the balance. Up to that point, however, the book, while satisfying the specialists, may well have confused the less sophisticated students of French affairs. A different organization and particularly the addition of a section on political parties would have helped. This is not to detract from the value of the book: particularly helpful is the section on electoral geography illustrated with many maps. There is, incidentally, no bibliography.

"It is important to understand," Mr. Goguel wisely states, "that the dissensions which make the French political situation so confusing have their roots in specific historical and social circumstances and are not simply the reflection of a sort of congenital French incapacity to adopt a reasonable and effective political conduct" (p. 146). He succeeds in clearly stating some of these factors, particularly the coexistence of pre-industrial and modern France. His analysis of the problem of institutions and of the chronic weakness of democratic government in France is rewarding, as are his interesting suggestions for institutional and electoral reform.

Some questionable assumptions of the author have led him to mistaken prognostics as to the immediate evolution of French politics. Among them is the assumed impossibility for the Center parties to form a lasting coalition due to dividing issues, including the religious one, and to the rigidity of the new party system. This assumption coupled with the belief that the Gaullist R.P.F. is a democratic party interested above all in governmental effectiveness and in social progress led him to look upon a probable alliance of the R.P.F., the Catholic M.R.P., and the Socialists, as the only way to escape the impasse into which the Republic had strayed. But the Pinay Government upset this prediction and led M. Goguel to explain the "miracle" in the epilogue of the book. Of course, the miracle continued after Pinay gave way to Mayer, supported as the latter was by a conservative coalition including the R.P.F. and the M.R.P. However desirable it might prove to be, the "progressive" coalition of Socialists, Catholics, and Gaullists is still not in sight.—CHARLES MICAUD, University of Virginia.

The Civil Service Today. By T. A. CRITCHLEY. (New York: John de Graff, Inc. Pp. 150. $3.00.)

How the Civil Service Works. By BOSWORTH MONCK. (New York: Macmillan Co. 1952. Pp. vi, 258. $5.00.)

Modern Staff Training: A Survey of Training Needs and Methods of Today. By F. J. TICKNER. (London: University of London Press Ltd. 1952. Pp. 159. 12/6 net.)

The books by Mr. Critchley and Mr. Monck are valuable for their information about changes introduced in the British public service during the war and reconstruction periods. We learn that the essential character of the Civil Service has remained the same but that there have been important modifications in past practices in order to adapt the administrative machine to changing political and social conditions. Mr. Critchley's well-written volume very adequately fulfills his purpose "to describe as accurately as possible the Civil Service as it exists today." The author deals in considerable detail with the organization of the Service and with the conditions governing public employment in Britain. He also takes his reader into the government offices and gives something of the atmosphere that can seldom be gained from the reading of command papers, annual reports, or Treasury circulars. He discusses the use of precedent books, which have almost the sanctity with civil servants that the reported cases have with the judges; the work of the departmental registries; the handling of the great volume of correspondence coming to government offices; and the practice of minuting. We learn how official rank is indicated by carpets, armchairs, one-piece telephone sets, and grate fires. Mr. Critchley's comments on the Service and its problems are temperate and judicious, as befits his position as a civil servant.

Mr. Monck also writes from experience. He was a war-time civil servant, and he was chairman of a group which prepared a Fabian Society report entitled The Reform of the Higher Civil Service. His purpose is not only to describe but to challenge. "Efficiency in administration," he says, "concerns everyone, and I believe that in a democratic society, people should be encouraged to say their piece on it." Saying his piece takes Mr. Monck a good bit beyond the Civil Service, for he discusses practically the whole organization and the total processes of the central government. In his introduction he proposes some changes which would have important effects upon long-established Civil Service principles. It is disappointing that he does not discuss these proposals at more length, for their merits cannot be judged in the summary form in which they are presented. In Part IV, entitled "The Public Service and the Government of the Day," he considers some ways in which the Civil Service could, in his view, be made a more effective instrument to carry out the policies of a cabinet and those of individual ministers. He rejects "large scale alterations on the American model" and instead proposes dynamic leadership by ministers, careful appointments and promotions to key departmental positions, more contacts between members of Parliament and civil servants, and occasional appointments from outside the Civil Service. None of these is revolutionary in character. Part V, about half of the book, is a useful summary of the functions and activities of the administrative departments of British government.

Since the last war the British government has paid a great deal more attention than formerly to the post-entry training of its employees. One sign of this new interest has been the appointment in the Treasury of a Director of Training and Education to stimulate and guide training activities throughout the Civil Service. Modern Staff Training, by the present occupant of this position, F. J. Tickner, is an excellent survey of the whole subject of employee-training. It deals with training problems and methods in both the public service and private industry and for the executive as well as the clerical worker. For the most part the book is as applicable to American organizations as to British. Every page of this volume reflects common sense, and it is highly recommended to all persons interested in personnel administration.—H. M. STOUT, Washington, D. C.

Contemporary Foreign Governments. By HERMAN BEUKEMA AND ASSOCIATES. (New York: Rinehart & Company. 1953. Pp. xx, 610. $5.50.)

Third edition of a textbook written by members of the department of social sciences of the U. S. Military Academy. The new edition leaves out Italy, but adds a short introductory chapter on some essentials of political science and goals of the comparative study of governments. Other useful innovations are: a glossary of terms; lists of questions after each chapter; and an appendix with texts of the constitutions of countries discussed. Because of its relative brevity and concentration upon essentials it is a very useful text for beginners' courses in foreign governments at the lower division level.

British Government. By HIRAM MILLER STOUT. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1953. Pp. ix, 433. $5.00.)

An adequate and up-to-date description of the British system. Despite a seeming preference for administrative detail over the processes of policy formation, the book is on the whole well rounded and the account is presented in a clear and straightforward manner.

The British General Election of 1951. By D. E. BUTLER. (New York: St. Martin's Press. 1952. Pp. viii, 289. $4.25.)

The third in the excellent series of Nuffield College studies of recent general elections by an Oxford scholar who also assisted in the preparation of the other two.

Strikes: A Study in Industrial Conflict with Special Reference to British Experience between 1911 and 1947. By K. G. J. C. KNOWLES. (New York: Philosophical Library. 1952. Pp. xiv, 330. $8.75.)

An extended analysis of strikes, drawn primarily from British experience. Deals first with the concept, sources of labor union militancy, and legal controls, then with causes and consequences, with emphasis on the use of statistical techniques.

The Choice before South Africa. By E. S. SACHS. (New York: Philosophical Library. 1952. Pp. ix, 220. $5.75.)

Written by the vigorous and controversial labor leader "Solly" Sachs, this book is addressed primarily to South Africans.

The Peoples and Policies of South Africa. By LEO MARQUARD. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1952. Pp. 257. $3.50.)

Also written by a South African, this volume deals more broadly with the historical background and with current problems. Like Sachs, Marquard pleads for a reintegrating racial partnership.

Assemblée Nationale. Recueil des textes authentiques des programmes et engagements électoraux des députés proclamés élus à la suite des élections générales du 17 juin 1951, dressé par les soins du Secrétaire général de l'Assemblée Nationale. (Paris: Imprimerie de l'Assemblée Nationale. 1952. Pp. 1045.)

The compilation of the party programs of the deputies elected to the French National Assembly on June 17, 1951, is arranged alphabetically by departments from Ain to Yonne, with Algeria, the overseas departments and constituencies at the end. This continues a similar publication of the Chambre des députés, from 1881 to 1936, commonly referred to under the name of its founder, Barodet. Work on the compilation for the first legislature of the National Assembly was undertaken at such a late date that the material when assembled was not printed but left in the Archives of the National Assembly. The present volume, which is the first of the new series of the Barodet, is indispensable to an understanding of the French political scene.—J.B.C.

Le Conseil d'Etat: livre jubilaire, publié pour commémorer son cent cinquantième anniversaire, 4 Nivose an VIII-24 décembre 1949. (Paris: Recueil Sirey. 1952. Pp. 693, plates.)

The book of essays to mark the 150th anniversary of the Council of State contains a section devoted to its legislative and administrative activity (pp. 377-477). The second part consists of papers from seventeen different countries dealing with administrative law in each and tracing any and all patterns stemming from the French Council of State.—J.B.C.

Wahlkampf und Machtverschiebung: Geschichte und Analyse der Berliner Wahlen vom 3. Dezember 1950. By DR. STEPHANIE MÜNKE WITH A. R. L. GURLAND, EDITOR AND COLLABORATOR. (Berlin: Duncker & Humblot. 1952. Pp. xix, 282.)

An exhaustive analysis of the Berlin elections of December, 1950, overpacked with masses of minute detail. Voters, candidates, parties, the electoral campaign and results, and many other related items are discussed in an encyclopedic manner.

Verslag van de toestand van het eilandgebied Aruba over 1951. (Oranjestad, Gezaghebber van het eilandgebied Aruba. 1952. 135 leaves, mimeographed.)

Under the Eilandregeling Nederlandse Antillen of March 3, 1951, promulgated in the Dutch Staatsblad, 1951, no. 64, concerning autonomous government given to the West Indian colony formerly known as Curaçao under the name of Netherlands Antilles, provision was made for special self-government of the island of Aruba. An elective Island Council (Eilandsraad) was installed on July 2, 1951. The report begins with a statement on the election, and includes the details of the new administration. The ordinances (legislation) for Aruba are printed in small octavo format under the title Aankondigingsblad Aruba.—J.B.C.

Jammu and Kashmir Government. Rules of business and procedure (Legislative Assembly). (Jammu: The Ranbir Government Press. 2009 [i.e. 1952]. Pp. 40.)

The rules regulate the business and procedure of the Jammu and Kashmir Constituent Assembly while functioning as the Legislative Assembly, under the authority of the Constitution Act, 1996, as amended by Act XVII of 2008. At the end of each session, the debates on the floor of the house are printed in both English and Urdu (Hindustani). The State of Jammu and Kashmir has a peculiar importance owing to the continuing discussion between India and Pakistan as to its status.—J.B.C.

República de Cuba. Reglamento del Consejo Consultivo. (La Habana: Editorial Atalaya, S. A. 1952. Pp. 27.)

When the 1940 Constitution of Cuba was suspended in the early part of 1952, the bicameral Congress was dissolved, and an Advisory Council was set up. The rules of Council as approved by the Council of Ministers, on May 9, 1952, were first printed in the Gaceta oficial, May 14. The Diario de sesiones of the two chambers of the Cuban Congress were usually a year or two late in appearing, and it seems likely that the Diario de sesiones of the Council will also not appear very promptly.—J.B.C.

Corte electoral. Elecciones uruguayas (Elecciones del 16 de Diciembre de 1951). Plebiscito de la Ley constitucional de 26 de Octubre de 1951. BY JULIO T. FABREGAT. (Montevideo. 1952. Pp. 13.)

The publication of the Uruguayan National Electoral Board contains the text of the constitutional amendments approved by the plebiscite of December 16, 1951. It also presents a table showing the total registered voters as of that date to be 1,158,939, and another showing the results of the vote of December 16, 1951, when only a total of 429,760 votes were cast, the amendments being approved by a vote of 237,076 to 197,684. Other tables give electoral statistics, 1925-50, percentages by party, by departments, total votes by party for president and for representatives.—J.B.C.

República Portuguesa. Constituição política da República Portuguesa actualizada de harmonia com a Lei n.º 2:048 de 11 de Junho de 1951. (Lisboa: Assembleia Nacional. 1952. Pp. 170.)

The text of the 1951 amendment relating to the Acto Colonial among other things refers to colonies as "provincias ultramarinas" and changes the name of the Ministério das Colónias to the Ministério do Ultramar. Texts of previous amendments are included as notes. The volume has an index by topic.—J.B.C.

The Constitution of the Republic of Korea. (Pusan: Office of Public Information. 1952. Pp. 33.)

The English text of the 1948 Constitution as amended in July, 1952, was prepared by the Office of Public Information of the Republic of Korea. The unicameral National Assembly is transformed into a bicameral body under the same name with a House of Councilors and a House of Representatives. Members of the National Assembly holding office at the time of amendment are to function as members of the House of Representatives. The President and Vice-President are to be elected by direct vote, and not by the National Assembly.—J.B.C.

Federation of Malaya. Report of Select Committee appointed on the 11th day of July, 1951, to examine and report to the Legislative Council on the Bill, the short title of which is The Federation of Malaya Agreement (Amendment) Ordinance, 1951. (Kuala Lumpur: Government Press. 1952. Pp. 35.)

The report of the committee on the Federation of Malaya citizenship act, which became effective on Sept. 15, 1952, was presented in the summer of 1952, and contains the technical statement in reference to the drafting of the measure as well as the draft for consideration.—J.B.C.

Israel. BY NORMAN BENTWICH. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company. 1953. Pp. 224. $3.75.)

From long experience with the British administration in Palestine and as a professor at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, the author provides a concise introduction to modern Israel: the physical setting, recent political history, the Arab problem, and an especially valuable description of government, law, and social and economic organization within the state today.

Russia and Her Colonies. BY WALTER KOLARZ. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1953. Pp. xiv, 334. $6.00.)

A critical analysis of Soviet policy in relation to non-Russian peoples within the U.S.S.R., based on a variety of Soviet sources—from textbooks and newspapers to novels and poetry. The author's conclusion can be summed up in the following sentence from the concluding chapter of the book: "If the Soviet régime continues in its present form there is no future for the peoples of Russia in the sense of a genuine political and cultural development."

My Uncle Joseph Stalin. By BUDU SVANIDZE. TRANSLATED BY WAVERLY ROOT. (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1953. Pp. xviii, 235. $3.00.)

An intimate and mostly non-political biography by a Georgian relative who escaped to the West. The period covered extends from around 1903-4 to November, 1945. Includes also some sidelights on Molotov, Beria, Malenkov, Voroshilov and other well-known Soviet figures.

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

Collective Security: A Progress Report. By ANDREW MARTIN. (Paris: UNESCO. 1952. Pp. 244. $1.25.)

By commission from UNESCO, Dr. Martin, of Ruskin College, Oxford, has undertaken to analyze perceptively the present state of "progress" toward collective security. Realizing that "collective security" is a concept on which there is no formal agreement, and that it remains undefined as a technical term in international law, Dr. Martin looks upon it as a "state of affairs"—distinguishable from

"world government" or the "organizational product of a network of treaties"—in which, in the proximate sense, "attempts to change the status quo by violence are unlawful and doomed to frustration through opposition in overwhelming force" (p. 14). He thus frees himself from the limitations of the purely legalistic approach, and is enabled to appraise the many ingredients—political, social, and military, as well as legal—that enter into this state of affairs. Dr. Martin expresses the optimistic viewpoint that might be expected from the sponsorship of his work: "The system of the United Nations, though by no means perfect, is viable in the long run, and, given sufficient moral cohesion among the majority of Members, it is even in the short run capable of curing the ill-effects of imperfect implementation" (p. 26). He balances the "over-optimistic" assumptions of 1945 against the "over-pessimistic" assumption that the United Nations would collapse as soon as the peace was broken or seriously threatened by one of the principal powers: "The system has survived both the severe shock of the open breach and the attrition of continuing threat" (ibid.).

Dr. Martin focusses his argument around the development of three principal sets of policies: (1) the regulation of armaments (pp. 27–86); (2) the pacific settlement of disputes (pp. 87–105); and (3) collective action (pp. 106–78). These principal policy-complexes are separately explored, with consideration, in each case, of early modern precedents, of the program of the League of Nations, and of the evolving experiences of the United Nations. A comprehensive "postscript" carries the story from May, 1951 through February, 1952. In his anxiety to develop a consistent argument, Dr. Martin occasionally makes assertions of facts which this reviewer considers questionable and draws some conclusions which might have been examined more closely. On the whole, however, the volume is stimulating to the imagination, challenging to the mind, and provocative of reflection on the course we have traversed since 1945. The viewpoint is fresh; the data are current; and such problems as the relationship of law to politics, and of universal to regional security, are examined in a cogent and realistic manner.

Trade and Payments in Western Europe: A Study in Economic Cooperation, 1947–51.

By WILLIAM DIEBOLD, JR. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1952. Pp. xi, 488. $4.50.)

Diebold discusses the various attempts since 1947 to integrate the economies of Western Europe. His book grew out of a chapter he contributed to Howard Ellis's volume, The Economics of Freedom (1950). Both books are publications of the Council on Foreign Relations.

Integration means creating—or at least progressing towards—a single economy for Western Europe in which goods can move as freely as within the United States. It would enable European producers to get greater benefits from mass production and would concentrate output of all articles where they can be produced most cheaply. Although as Diebold warns, "there is no adequate basis for judging how great an increase in production . . . Western Europe could expect" (p. 406), many informed people have been enthusiastic about the possibilities.

The logical first step towards integration was to create a method for paying for intra-European trade. Part One deals with the European Payments Union and its predecessors. EPU is a kind of clearinghouse in which trading debits and credits of a member get balanced against each other (or cleared) irrespective of the fact that they were incurred in different currencies. Thus, if a country earns money by exporting to one member, EPU enables it to spend the proceeds in any of the others. EPU is a creaking, unsatisfactory piece of machinery if compared to the pre-1914 gold standard, but it is a great improvement over what immediately preceded it.

A clearing union creates only the opportunity to trade. It must be followed by removing barriers such as quotas, tariffs, and cartels. On paper, a good deal of progress was achieved in breaking down the worst obstacles, but Diebold shows in Part Two why the progress was less than it appeared.

Part Three takes up the various attempts to form customs unions, the most notable being Benelux. It had been hoped that integration of the economies of Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxembourg would be easy at the end of the war because all three would be starting from scratch. The problem of vested interests demanding protection from foreign competition would be at a minimum. Unfortunately, the ruined Netherlands was liberated only ter Belgium had made a substantial start towards recovery. Hence, Benelux was unable to commence with all three economies at zero. Progress towards a full customs union has been slow and disappointing.

Diebold's economics is sophisticated rather than profound. For a book dealing with complex economic problems, it is comparatively easy reading. The author was concerned with what has been, not with what might have been; though he gives the pros and cons of the various proposals discussed, he refrains from giving advice, deals more with what governments did than with what they said, and ignores the esoteric proposals of his brother economists. He pays little attention to the Schuman Plan, which he promises to take up in a subsequent volume.—RENDIGS FELS, Vanderbilt University.

The Commonwealth of Man: An Inquiry into Power Politics and World Government. BY FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN. (New York: Alfred A. Knopf. 1952. Pp. xi, 494. $5.00.)

After six months on a grant from the Foundation for World Government, Professor Schuman has reassessed the "times in which we have the misfortune to live" (p. 252) and has found a "mad America" (p. 275) in a "demented world" (p. 281). Directly or by implication, he declares repeatedly that those who do not accept world government as the one road to salvation are fools, blind, or dishonest.

The Commonwealth of Man starts out as an inquiry into the validity of the proposition that world anarchy threatens man with destruction from which only world government can save him (p. 19). The inquiry soon becomes special pleading in elaboration of the argument which the author introduced into the fourth edition of his International Politics. Once again, where we might have profited from a theoretical and philosophical approach to the problem or from a comprehensive report on the federalist movement, we are subjected to a jeremiad on the state of world politics.

Behind a screen of confusing titles, Schuman first reexamines the nature of war and of the state, the unity of mankind, tribalism, and the origin of the brotherhood of man concept. What he calls the "world states" of the past are then analyzed with reference to the four "preconditions of all government and therefore of world government": myth, adaptation, authority, and a ruling class (p. 118). The same treatment, but at greater length, is given the two "world states" of today, the U. S. and the U.S.S.R., neither of which, the author concludes, can achieve world mastery and hence world peace. He passes on to such means to peace as functionalism (principally the international unions, both public and private) and collective security and attempts to demolish the claims made for both. The latter is "futile . . . beyond reasonable doubt in the minds of reasonable men" (p. 369), and the United Nations receives some of his most savage attacks.

Only after four hundred pages of power politics do we get to consider world government. A somewhat conventional treatment of federalism is followed by an all too sketchy account of the federalist movement. Here for a space the darkness recedes before a small flame of hope only to close in again as the author, adagio lamentoso, describes the failure which thus far has beset the Cause. The failure is ascribed largely to the want of a Myth by which to bring substantial numbers of men to embrace the Cause (p. 475).

Professor Schuman's argument leaves him with little hope. More faith in man and less in "the most recent findings of the social sciences" (see the jacket blurb), a more balanced view of this country's role, a more accurate analysis of history, and he might face a less dismal future.

The Commonwealth of Man has been written in anguish and passion born of deep conviction. But so prejudiced is the author's handling of his material and so extreme are his views that his argument loses much of its force. Moreover we must wade through purple passages, alliterative allusions, catalogues of instance and example, and long-winded digressions whose effect is to deter all but the hardy and the converted. Nor is the going made pleasanter by the author's weakness for sweeping or extravagant statements: "All statesmen by nature crave power" (p. 15); "War is a habit which men enjoy as they enjoy drunkenness . . . fornication . . . and crime" (p. 45); "the dismal hypothesis that the American course is primarily a phenomenon of psychopathology" (p. 230); and for diction such as in the following: "Thus far all federations . . . have not been the offspring of any process of political parthenogenesis but have been the polygamously conceived progeny of the coupling of the federal concept with . . . national patriotism" (p. 474). But perhaps most trying are the denunciations with which the book abounds. Schuman lays about him with the vigor, if not the happy effect, of Samson at Lehi. He will hardly expect his philistines to get up and applaud.—JAMES T. WATKINS IV, Stanford University.

Free India in Asia. BY WERNER LEVI. (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press. 1952. Pp. 161. $2.75.)

Jawaharlal Nehru, Prime Minister of India and chief formulator of his country's foreign policy, places "independence" in approach at the apex of his hierarchy of guides to international affairs. Those for whom the communist issue dominates all others experience perplexity, if not annoyance and hostility, at this introduction of a confusing element in a situation which seems so clearly a two-sided affair. The communists (Indian and otherwise) and the Free World join in questioning India's ideological position—on differing grounds and with contrary sympathies, but with equal vigor. The result is that a Cold War is being fought with unique persistence in India, the reluctant host playing referee at the same time that he gropes for a domestic and external policy that will best serve the rising demands of the Indian people. It is to this dramatic and powerful issue that Werner Levi has addressed himself in Free India in Asia.

The author wisely chose to concentrate his analysis upon one major aspect of the total problem. India's interest in Asian affairs has a history of thousands of years. More recently British rule and the impact of Western ideas and institutions have obscured an older Asian relationship. With independence it is natural to observe the redefining of India's interests in which her immediate neighbors (minus Pakistan) take a goodly measure of friendly priority. But, as Levi observes, Asia is a continent in which differences and conflicts, inter se, are as formidable as common interests are obvious.

Having chosen an historically fundamental theme, the author has been able to write a book of lasting significance in which topics of timely importance find their roots in the more basic traditions and circumstances. This reviewer would have appreciated greater emphasis upon the external implications of India's domestic policy, an interrelationship that seems particularly pertinent in India's case. The chapters on communism, imperialism and democracy, on the other hand, represent a most excellent presentation of the ideological issues posed in Indian perspective. More than an American's critique of Indian foreign policy, this book is a series of reflections by a careful student of international affairs on India's underlying motivations in the conduct of her foreign relations.

The few typographical errors are minor defects; excellent references and a full index add immeasurably to the value of this book for classroom use.—RICHARD L. PARK, University of California, Berkeley.

Woodrow Wilson and The Far East. BY RUSSELL H. FIFIELD. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company. 1952. Pp. xv, 383. $5.00.)

Woodrow Wilson's China Policy, 1918-1917. BY TIEN-YI LI. (New York: University of Kansas City Press—Twayne Publishers. 1952. Pp. 268. $4.50.)

As their titles indicate, the two volumes on the Far East under review do not touch directly upon the present grave international crisis across the Pacific. They deal with American policy in the Far East under the Wilson Administration, one covering both presidential terms, the other the first, and to that extent they are complementary. But they are both exceedingly valuable and timely studies: for (1) they augment significantly our growing fund of accurate and detailed knowledge of a recent period of American diplomacy relating to the Far East, each predicated upon pertinent and trustworthy documentary sources and containing an excellent working bibliography; and (2) they provide at the same time highly instructive object lessons from which the United States, as the leader in world affairs today, could profit in any move to resolve the extremely critical situation in the Far East. To scholars and students of American diplomatic history and to all who are interested in an efficacious American Far Eastern policy in these parlous times, they are unreservedly recommended.

When President Wilson assumed office in 1913, the United States was confronted with another assault of Western financial imperialism in China as the infant Chinese Republic was struggling to stand on its feet. He decided that the United States should have no part in it. At the same time he sought to bolster the strength of the young republic by according it the recognition of a major power. But before much good could be accomplished by this policy, Japan, on the outbreak of war in Europe, and therefore relatively free of international restraints, launched a determined attempt to dominate China, following the expulsion of Germany from the Far East. With Manchuria in possession, she was on her way. Wilson resorted to diplomacy to curb her. But, as the United States became inexorably drawn into the European conflict, and the Far East thereby receded in importance, Japan met little or no opposition. Nor at the Paris Peace Conference did Wilson find success in thwarting Japan, for Britain and France were on Japan's side, and he had also to submit to the compromising of his principles in order to bring to birth the League of Nations. Although Japan seemingly suffered a reversal at the subsequent Washington Conference of 1921-22, convened by the Harding Administration, Japanese imperialism had reaped enough substantial gains to encourage Japan to undertake the bold and reckless outburst of conquest of the Far East a decade or so later.

President Wilson fell regrettably short in his efforts to head off the imperialism of Japan. The host of causes and circumstances that accounted for his failure is admirably discussed and analyzed by the two authors. Today it is Soviet imperialism in the Far East, more masterful and powerful, against which the United States has taken the leadership. The United States is faced with a situation which is comparable and analogous in a great variety of ways. Will there again be failure?—N. WING MAH, University of California, Berkeley.

The Korea Story. BY JOHN C. CALDWELL IN COLLABORATION WITH LESLEY FROST. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Company. 1952. Pp. 180. $3.00.)

This short volume is the highly personal account of Mr. Caldwell's experience, first as an information officer, and then as a would-be businessman, in Korea between 1948 and 1950. It is bitterly critical of the State Department, and its standards of documentation and fairness leave much to be desired.

Yet the book is not worthless. When Mr. Caldwell resists the temptation to pass judgments beyond his knowledge, and when he is not engaged in over-arguing his own controversial case (he resigned under pressure in 1949), his observations are often of real interest. There is a sound of sour truth in his general description of the American colony in Seoul, and his own work as an information officer, especially at the time of the 1948 elections, is described with real skill and enthusiasm; even in his clearly embittered account of his battle with Washington, he scores some telling points. The student who discounts for bias and weighs lightly for lack of evidence will find useful raw material in this book. He will also look for other and better sources.—McGEORGE BUNDY, Harvard University.

Democracy and Foreign Policy: A Case History: The Sino-Japanese Dispute, 1931-33. By R. BASSETT. (London, New York and Toronto: Longmans, Green and Co. 1952. Pp. xxiii, 654. 42/-net.)

An extraordinarily detailed study of what was said and done in Great Britain about the "Manchurian crisis" of 1931-33, by a Lecturer at the London School who is interested in determining how much what was done was really affected by what was said. In what is in many respects a public opinion study, the author succeeds admirably in pointing out how the passage of a few years has brought a very complex and controversial issue to be treated simply as a matter of "Japanese aggression," and he appears to have left no newspaper, Parliamentary report, or public document unturned in building his case.

Formosa: A Problem for United States Foreign Policy. BY JOSEPH W. BALLANTINE. (Washington: The Brookings Institution. 1952. Pp. xi, 218. $2.75.)

Here Formosa is given the typical Brookings "problem paper" treatment by a former Director of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs of the State Department. An introduction describes the physical setting and summarizes the history of Japanese rule, the second section traces developments on and affecting Formosa since 1945, and the conclusion poses the unresolved questions of U. S. policy toward Formosa. Included is an estimate of the viability of the Nationalist government, the place of Formosa in Far Eastern and United Nations affairs, and the position of Formosa in any long-run approach to a new China policy.

Our Love Affair with Germany. BY HANS HARE. (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1953. Pp. 247. $3.00.)

A veteran reporter of the European scene, who watched the occupation from both official and private posts in Germany after the war, concludes that the whole affair has been mishandled since the first demand for "unconditional surrender." If there is war Germany will be overrun by the Russians and will opportunistically support the occupiers; if there is peace German governments will move progressively nearer National Socialism, although probably under another name.

Open Door Diplomat: The Life of W. W. Rockhill. BY PAUL A. VARG. (Urbana: The University of Illinois Press. 1952. Pp. ix, 141. Cloth. $3.50; paper $2.50.)

A brief study of the diplomatic career of W. W. Rockhill, who is best remembered for his part in drafting the Open Door note at the turn of the century, and who subsequently served as Minister to China, Ambassador to Russia, Ambassador to Turkey, and closed his career as adviser to President Yuan Shih-k'ai of the new Chinese Republic. There is no revision of history here, but interesting use has been made of the Rockhill papers.

United States Treaties and Other International Agreements; Vol. 1, 1950. BY THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE. (Washington, D. C.: U. S. Government Printing Office. 1952. Pp. ix, 932, ix. $5.75.)

Reorganization Plan No. 20 of 1950 transferred the editing of the Statutes at large from the Department of State to the Federal Register Division of the National Archives and Record Service, with the exception of treaties. The Act of Sept. 23, 1950, authorized the Secretary of State to edit an annual volume of treaties, which are no longer included in the Statutes at large. Arrangement is in the numerical order of the publication in pamphlet form as Treaties and other international acts series, cited as TIAS. Treaty texts are reproduced in all languages in which they were concluded. The Department recommends that the annual volume be cited as UST.—J.B.C.

Foreign Relations of the United States: Diplomatic Papers, 1934. Vol. V, The American Republic. COMPILED BY THE U. S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE. (Washington: U. S. Government Printing Office. 1952. Pp. lxii, 674. $2.75.)

Papers concerning Latin-American relations in an uneventful year, marked mainly by the withdrawal of the Marines from Haiti, the opening of conversations regarding trade agreements with several governments, and an interesting exchange concerning payment of the Panama Canal annuity in gold or "devalued dollars."

Modern Nationalities: A Sociological Study. BY FLORIAN ZNANIECKI. (Urbana: The University of Illinois Press. 1952. Pp. xvi, 196. $3.95.)

A brief, readable, and reasonably familiar approach to the problem of modern nationalism, by a University of Illinois sociologist who suggests that cultural nationalism is a greater force than political nationalism, that the former often persists without the latter, and that hope for a peaceful future more probably lies in cultural cooperation and the development of a world culture than in any world government.

The Return of Germany: A Tale of Two Countries. BY NORBERT MUHLEN. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Company. 1953. Pp. 310. $4.50.)

A current journalistic report on how people are thinking and living, and what their leaders are saying and doing, in the two Germanies. The tentative conclusion is that the Soviet experiment is failing in the East, that the democratic experiment in the West has not yet succeeded, and that Germany still remains a central problem for both sides in the world struggle.

World Without End: The Middle East. BY EMIL LENGYEL. (New York: The John Day Company. 1953. Pp. 374. $3.75.)

Avoiding the usual country-by-country approach of similar surveys, this is a useful introduction to the entire region—people, geography, cultures, internal problems, and the interaction of domestic politics and world events. The author urges greater direct participation in the area by the United States.

The International Labour Code, 1951. (Geneva: International Labour Office. 1952. 2 vols. Pp. clv, 1181; xxxix, 1220. $10.00.)

A two volume codification of the Conventions (intended as creating international obligations) and Recommendations (intended as defining standards for member countries) adopted by the International Labour Conference from 1919 to 1951. Usefully arranged by subject matter, and preceded by a valuable introduction and explanatory notes as to the nature of the code and procedures involved in its development.

Economic Stability in a Changing World: Essays in Economic Theory and Policy. BY JOHN H. WILLIAMS. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1953. Pp. vi, 284. $5.00.)

A collection of previously published papers and essays by an outstanding economist, heavily oriented toward policy making and empiricism. The central section consists of six "Marshall Plan Papers," preceded and followed by more recent and earlier papers on the policy implications of Keynes' work and issues in international trade policy.

Preliminary Report on the World Social Situation. (New York: United Nations Publications, Department of Social Affairs. 1952. Pp. v, 180. $1.75.)

An ambitious attempt to reach some general conclusions and to point up some of the most pressing problems concerning population trends, health conditions, food supplies, housing, education, income levels, and living standards. Three concluding chapters deal more specifically with Latin America, the Middle East, and South and Southeast Asia.

India, Pakistan, and the West. BY PERCIVAL SPEAR. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1953. Pp. 251. $2.00.)

Second edition of a useful introductory volume, with an additional chapter briefly tracing political events since partition.

POLITICAL THEORY, RESEARCH, AND METHODOLOGY

Communist Doctrine and the Free World. By MARGUERITE J. FISHER. (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press. 1952. Pp. viii, 288. $4.50.)

In seventeen chapters and nearly 300 pages, Mrs. M. J. Fisher, professor at the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs of Syracuse University, attempts to give—not in her own words, but in the words of the main prophets (Marx, Engels, Lenin and Stalin)—a summary of the ideological framework of communism. There is also a running commentary, lively and concise, and in the last chapter an able refutation of some basic communist tenets. Quotations and comments are kept strictly separate.

The collected works of the prophets include scores of volumes. Most of their content is of course repetitious and an application of the basic creed to specific problems and situations. Having ploughed through the volumes (at least those available in the English language), Mrs. Fisher has condensed the fundamentals so as to give a clear picture of the whole ideological system. Her book should be read by all those needing a clear notion of what modern communism is.

Mrs. Fisher rightly stresses the importance attributed to theory by the communists. In the current conflict the realm of reason plays a role which is too often ignored on our side. It is an unpleasant paradox that we who stress freedom because we believe in man's responsibility based on his rational powers, are often more ignorant of the reasoning underlying our position than the communists are of the reasoning underlying theirs. They seem to realize more than we do that clear ideas are a necessary preliminary to clear action. We may laugh at times at the rather scholastic discussions taking place among communists, on the fine points of distinction between one faction and another—but we should not laugh too much. Communists are dogmatic in their thinking but theirs is a dogmatic rationalism; they call themselves materialists but in practice they recognize the importance of the mind and keep a close connection between mind and action.

It would have helped the readers if it had been made clearer that the book deals with one school only of communism, specifically with the Marxist-Leninist school. Of the 150-odd quotations which form the bulk of the volume, more than half are Lenin's; the rest are from Marx, Engels and Stalin. Through the efforts of Lenin and of the Stalin who wrote the Foundations of Leninism and the Problems of Leninism, there is a body of doctrine to which the term "Marxism-Leninism" rightly applies. Not even Marx can be identified entirely with this type of communism: whatever his stress on a scientific method (which he used most clumsily), Marx remained basically a utopian socialist endowed with only a vague notion of what a socialist or a communist society would be. Lenin belonged to a different world. Many maintain that Marx would have been horrified by what Lenin did in 1918–22. Possibly they are right.

In consulting the book, the reader should be aware that there is a danger in describing an ideology on the basis of quotations only; often the letter of the doctrine may not correspond to the interpretation given by those who are inspired by that doctrine. Moreover the mass of written evidence is such that a quotation can be found to prove practically any point; which quotations then should be selected? Mrs. Fisher has an understanding of Marxism-Leninism which I believe to be correct. She has chosen her quotations to substantiate her understanding. But millions of communists, many in good faith, would refute that understanding and could bring as many quotations to substantiate a different interpretation of Marxism-Leninism. The book gives us a picture of Marxism-Leninism as we see it. However, the movement can be evaluated correctly only if we know what picture is seen by those who belong to it.

An immediate and important problem is raised by Mrs. Fisher's book: To what extent does the knowledge of Marxism-Leninism (indispensable for the correct appreciation of the policies of Lenin, and of Stalin during the early years of his rule) help us to understand the movement with which are identified at least ten of the twelve communist-governed states of today, six million party members in non-communist countries, and about twenty million voters in states where free elections take place? Most quotations in Communist Doctrine and the Free World are taken from books written before 1928. We know that in the Soviet Union and in the satellite states of Europe and Asia, the official doctrine is called Marxism-Leninism. Actually, today's Soviet communism may be as far, in practice and in theory, from Marxism-Leninism as this was from Marxism. In spite of plentiful evidence, not enough attention has been paid in the free countries to the revision of Marxism-Leninism which has taken place since the middle thirties and its gradual replacement with what, for lack of a better term, may be called Stalinism. The doctrine of Stalinism is at present in the state in which Marxism-Leninism was before Stalin himself crystallized the doctrine of his predecessor in Foundations of Leninism and in Problems of Leninism. There is already available, however, enough material to complete Mrs. Fisher's book and to present the arguments supporting the foremost twentieth century doctrine devised for the rational justification of despotism.—MASSIMO SALVADORI, Smith College.

The Quest for Community: A Study in the Ethics of Order and Freedom. By ROBERT A. NISBET. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1953. Pp. ix, 303. $5.00.)

The role of liberal values in present-day democratic societies has become a question of mounting concern to many Western intellectuals, as the liberal creed has gradually declined in favor, and as totalitarian movements have steadily gained. The question is central in this book, written by a sociologist.

The author's apparent purpose is to sound a warning for all democrats: If you do not want to slip into a totalitarian morass, you must deliberately build a pluralist society. Only in a pluralist society can we have both freedom and democracy. The author elaborates his plea for "pluralist democracy" in the now familiar sociological terms of "community."

Professor Nisbet claims that prior to the advent of liberalism, Western societies abounded in local associations like the family, guild, church, and village. These intimate associations performed meaningful functions in men's lives, and they satisfied the psychological need for "community." But during the 19th century the ties holding men together in these associations were cut by rampant individualism. The prime liberal values were the free individual and the sovereign people. With the realization of these values, the state became the sole association for achieving the goals of individuals, as well as the single locus of allegiance and authority. Standing alone as just one of the masses, the individual was confronted by the impersonal, centralized nation state. But in the context of the mass state, liberal values ceased to have meaning, for even these values depended upon the context of local associations. So we find 20th century man in quest of "community." Yet the only remaining link between the atomized mass of individuals and the total state is the ideology of the absolute political community.

What is to be done? We must regard the "individual" as a member of free associations, and we must regard the "people" as an arrangement of quasi-sovereign groups, with the state merely one of many associations. We must revive the intimate "intermediate" associations by vesting them with functions meaningful in the lives of men today. For it is these plural communities which must curb the authority of the state, if that essential balance between order and freedom is to be maintained in democratic societies. So endeth the lesson.

This thesis—which is familiar to those acquainted with recent political thought of Christian inspiration—is no doubt plausible. Yet the argument has a hollow ring. Perhaps it is because the discourse is admittedly within the realm of morals, and because moral arguments have that unfortunate quality of being unconvincing if you do not agree at the outset, and superfluous if you do. Or perhaps it is because the argument remains throughout at a level of abstraction which approximates pure sound. Such generality may be required to get at the big picture, and the big picture may be important to understand. But to be significant the big picture must portray what it represents, and ten thousand words are no assurance of this.

Beyond these reasons, however, the argument rings hollow because it is almost entirely an enterprise in logic. Logic has its uses, but it is a poor substitute for experience in political analysis. Perhaps individualistic liberalism does logically develop into the absolute political community. But Professor Nisbet has prepared his lesson for warm-bodied democrats, and they must perforce ask: Does our experience show that "individualistic liberalism" was ever more than a dream, or nightmare? Does our experience show that "intermediate associations" were destroyed in democratic societies? Does our experience show that associative life, say in America, is now sparse and sterile? Or does our experience show instead the inadequacy of Professor Nisbet's assumptions?

Though the author fails, in the opinion of this reviewer, to make a convincing case for his thesis, this book is still rewarding. Not only is it written in a lively style, but there are many stimulating insights and interesting observations. These passing thoughts, taken altogether, furnish a provocative if deficient discussion of the role of liberal values in democratic societies.—CURRIN V. SHIELDS, University of California, Los Angeles.

Human Problems in Technological Change: A Casebook. EDITED BY EDWARD H. SPICER. (New York: Russell Sage Foundation, 1952. Pp. 301. $4.00.)

Technological innovations are being rapidly introduced into many backward areas of the world, usually with serious consequences in social disintegration and loss of morale to the communities concerned. Fifteen such cases ranging from simple to complex in the problem presented are analyzed from the point of view of finding basic concepts and principles which would be of value to the innovator attempting to direct such cultural changes. The book is primarily a text, making suggestions, provoking thought, and attempting to analyze the nature of technological change.

Faktoren der Machtbildung: Wissenschaftliche Studien zur Politik. EDITED BY A. R. L. GURLAND. (Berlin: Duncker & Humblot, 1952. Pp. 200.)

A collection of five political studies on varied topics touching upon the problem of power in politics. Written by German political scientists, mostly members of the Institute for Political Science in Berlin. A brief concluding article deals with American polls of public opinion and related topics.

Henri Comte De Saint-Simon (1760-1825): Selected Writings. EDITED AND TRANSLATED BY F. M. H. MARKHAM. (New York: The Macmillan Company, 1953. Pp. li, 116. $2.00.)

Selections designed to give a picture of the development of St. Simon's thought from 1803 to 1825, including, among others, excerpts from Letters from an Inhabitant of Geneva, Essay on the Science of Man, Reorganization of the European Community, On Social Organization, and The New Christianity. The volume represents the only available English translation of St. Simon's work and therefore fills a definite gap in the literature dealing with French Utopian Socialists.

Bentham and the Ethics of Today. BY DAVID BAUMGARDT. (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1952. Pp. xiv, 584. $9.00.)

A reexamination of Bentham's ethical ideas expressed in his publications and unpublished manuscripts with a view to correcting misinterpretations and reassessing the fundamental importance of these ideas for the ethics of today.

Political Tracts of Wordsworth, Coleridge and Shelley. EDITED BY R. J. WHITE. (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1953. Pp. xlv, 303. $6.00.)

Edited reproductions of Coleridge's Statesman's Manual and A Lay Sermon, Wordsworth's The Convention of Cintra and Shelley's A Defence of Poetry and A Philosophical View of Reform, all originally published between 1809 and 1821 and most of them not hitherto easily available. Some non-political passages have been omitted. An introduction by the editor is included.

Selections from Bayle's Dictionary. EDITED BY E. A. BELLER AND M. DUP. LEE, JR. (Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1952. Pp. xxxiv, 312. $6.00.)

A reproduction of eighteen articles from Pierre Bayle's Historical and Critical Dictionary, first published in French in 1697, with an excellent introduction by the editors in which they assess Bayle's rightful place as a seventeenth-century thinker and his significant influence on eighteenth-century liberal thought.

Planning for Freedom: And Other Essays and Addresses. BY LUDWIG VON MISES. (South Holland, Illinois: Libertarian Press, 1952.)

A series of essays and addresses by Ludwig von Mises during the period 1945-1951. Collectively they express the well-known economic and sociological views for which Professor von Mises has become famous and serve to underscore the positions taken by him in his Theory of Money and Credit, Omnipotent Government, and Bureaucracy.

A Christian Commentary on Communism. BY EDWARD ROGERS. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1952. Pp. x, 238. $3.50.)

Originally appearing in England under the title A Commentary on Communism, the present work constitutes the Rev. Edward Rogers' Femly-Hartley Lectures for 1951. The author traces the evolution of the communist ideal from its classic beginnings through modern communism and concludes that modern communism fails to take into consideration the full nature of man. He finds a solution to the problem in the broader philosophy of Christian supernaturalism.

The Quaker Approach. EDITED BY JOHN KAVANAUGH. (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1953. Pp. vi, 243. $4.00.)

A collection of essays by leading Quakers of Europe and the U. S., eloquently explaining the Quaker "point of view" on thirteen subjects, as diverse as peace and war, economic life, crime and punishment, science, Quakers and the Russians. The volume commemorates the 300th anniversary of the Society of Friends.

Errors of Psychotherapy. BY SEBASTIAN DE GRAZIA. (New York: Doubleday & Co. 1952. Pp. 288. $3.00.)

In a book which through most of its pages seems to be unrelated to political science, the argument is finally advanced that "mental disorder and psychotherapy" are "problems of morality and law," and that the "heal-the-breach method" of psychotherapy for the inner man must be supplemented with a vision of order in the outer world, which becomes the responsibility of religion and political science.

Survey of the Social Sciences in Western Germany. BY MAX HORKHEIMER. (Washington: Library of Congress. 1952. Pp. ix, 225. $1.00.)

A list of various Western German institutions, professional organizations, periodicals and books (published and under preparation) dealing with social sciences, mainly sociology and anthropology. The period covered extends from October, 1950 to September, 1951.

Introduction to Government. BY ROBERT RIE-
NOW. (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, Inc. 1952. Pp. xxxii, 583. $5.00.)

An introductory textbook, designed for a general course in principles and practices. Major emphasis is on the American system but chapters are included on Britain, France and Russia.

Democracy Is You: A Guide to Citizen Action. BY RICHARD WAVERLY POSTON. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1953. Pp. xi, 312. $3.00.)

Richard Poston, director of the Bureau of Community Development at the University of Washington, envisions democracy as being rooted in citizen concern with, and participation in, community life. This book seeks to indicate the organizational methods that can be employed to stimulate community cooperation in the solution of local problems at the local level.
